As for the link itself, can my right hon. Friend confirm that as the route moves through the Ebbsfleet valley between Northfleet and Swanscombe, there will be a distinct possibility of the construction of an international station there?

Secondly, part of the proposal involves the movement of some passenger trains from the new route to the Chatham line, via the disused Gravesend, West line. Will my right hon. Friend confirm the status of that line? Is it a new line? If so, will it qualify for environmental protection? If not, will it qualify for it anyway?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not sure of all the reasons for the Opposition not wanting me to make a statement on Wednesday, but I was endeavouring to be as helpful as I could—so it was an extraordinary way to behave to give as much publicity as possible to a leak, and hence a great deal of provocation the next day. Then, to accuse me of uncertainty and of not coming forward quickly enough just compounded the error.

On my hon. Friend's two points, yes, it would be possible for the location that he mentioned to be a station. I have already said that we have taken no decisions about stations and that we will wait for the responses. On the question of reinstating the Gravesend, West branch line to find a means of making a connection between the high-speed channel tunnel link and Waterloo, so that international trains could continue to use Waterloo if they were coming up that link—which has considerable advantage—I can tell my hon. Friend that it would be the disused line. I have no reason to believe that the environmental and other impacts cannot be dealt with successfully.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): The Secretary of State has referred to the effects of the proposal on the north and the north-west of England. Can he develop that a little further? We are extremely concerned about the lack of investment in and the deterioration of the north-west line. If nothing is done and if there is no investment, it will not be able to match the sort of development to which the right hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. MacGregor: That is a separate issue from today's statement. However, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that without question, and from both the passenger and freight points of view, I am keen to ensure that the north of England and Scotland gain as much benefit as possible from the channel tunnel and from the high-speed link. Therefore, an important consideration in looking at the stations was to ensure that those areas were not disadvantaged in any way.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the commuters of north-east Kent will welcome his announcement today for the benefits that, as he has rightly pointed out, it will bring to them by alleviating the congestion in south London. Can he confirm that any investment in the fast link will not be allowed to detract from the immediate investment in the necessary improvements to the Kent coast line?

Mr. MacGregor: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's views on this matter. We have already said that that line is one possibility—I cannot say any more until I get BR's recommendations—for the £150 million leasing proposals announced in the autumn statement. However, I cannot be certain at this stage. I assure him that British Rail—and, in due course, Railtrack—will be very much aware of the pressures to which he referred.

My hon. Friend will recognise that commuters from Kent will benefit very substantially indeed from this investment. I shall give a couple of illustrations to make my point. The time from Ashford to central London will be reduced from 70 to 42 minutes, and from Gravesend from 50 to 20 minutes.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Why is the Secretary of State perpetuating the uncertainty and blight that affects King's Cross by not ruling out, once and for all, the over-expensive, low-level station at King's Cross, and instead going for the St. Pancras option? Is it not time that BR was instructed to withdraw the King's Cross Railways Bill from Parliament?

On the question of the north London line, will the right hon. Gentleman give a guarantee that the strictest environmental standards will apply to the stretch of line from Dalston to St. Pancras as well as to the stretch of the line east of Dalston?

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Gentleman's second point, we will apply the same strict environmental standards to all parts of the line. On his first, I am anxious to get on and to reach a decision. I could not do so today, because further work must be done on a number of aspects mentioned in my statement before we can reach a final view.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the route that he announced today passes a densely populated area in Northfleet and Gravesend in my constituency, within half a mile of 5,000 of my constituents. Will he ensure that all possible engineering and environmental expertise is brought to bear in the consultation process, to ensure that our environment is properly protected?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I assure my hon. Friend that all that will be carefully examined. There is a proposal for a tunnel in Pepper hill in my hon. Friend's constituency, but whether it will be a tunnel or a bridge-cum-viaduct can be explored in the public consultation.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Is the Secretary of State aware that I hope to present a petition tomorrow from the people of Hackney, against the easterly route—which goes through the heart of the borough? Is the right hon. Gentleman's promise that the line from Strateford and through Hackney will be in a tunnel—real and unconditional—or is it a politician's promise, which could be broken as part of a future cost-cutting exercise?

Mr. MacGregor: No, it is clear from my statement today that in so far as the link affects the hon. Gentleman's constituency, it will be tunnelled. We made that commitment clear in today's statement. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not find it necessary now to present his petition tomorrow.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I welcome this major investment in our railways, and I am particularly glad that my right hon. Friend has chosen a route that I first recommended nearly five years ago in my Conservative Political Centre book, "Tunnel Vision". Is my right hon. Friend certain that he will not find himself challenged in any way under section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987? Will environmental expenditure on the railway, which all right hon. and hon. Members welcome, be no less fundable from public sources than environmental protection in the case of road schemes such as the Winchester bypass? Also, will my right hon. Friend seriously consider the upgrading and full electrification of the Tonbridge-Redhill-Reading route, which would help so much in moving freight traffic around London and to the north?

Mr. MacGregor: I assure my hon. Friend that we will meet our obligations under section 42 of the 1987 Act, and that we will apply the same environmental standards and assessments to the channel tunnel high-speed rail link as we do to the road programme. I have no further comment on my hon. Friend's final point.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Secretary of State recall that, on 14 October 1991, his predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), at col. 37 of Hansard, gave me an undertaking that the route from Stratford to King's Cross would be wholly in tunnel? Why is the Secretary of State now proposing an overland route as one option? What will be the effect on local north London line services and on the environment of people living alongside that line both east and west of the proposed station, given the great increase in traffic on the link to the western region as well?

Mr. MacGregor: The route to King's Cross would have to have been in tunnel, but we are now talking about a route to St. Pancras, because that seems to offer considerable advantages. Quite a large part of it will be tunnelled, but not all of it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will carefully study today's report and the later report from Union Railways.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): My right hon. Friend stressed the benefit to Kent commuters of the new line. My constituents will be impressed if there will definitely be a station on the new line in the Medway area. In any case, like my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), those of my constituents who are commuters will be much less impressed if that takes money from the Kent coast line, which is long overdue for upgrading in terms of both the line and rolling stock.

Mr. MacGregor: I note my hon. Friend's comments, and I know that he has often pressed that case. I cannot add today to my earlier comments about stations. There will be opportunities, and clearly we are anxious to secure benefits for commuters of the huge new investment. That is a main reason why the Government are prepared to make a substantial public sector contribution to stations as well as for other purposes. As to exactly where the stations will be, it will be wise to wait until we have received the full response to the public consultation.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that, until the end of the century, virtually all the channel tunnel passenger trains—and freight trains as well—will travel through my constituency, from Herne Hill to Brixton? Does he realise that, if his earlier answer is correct, even after the turn of the century a good many freight trains up to 1,000 yd long will be travelling along the route—throughout the night in most cases—hauled, initially, by diesel locomotives? Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that people whose property adjoins existing railways that will be forced to suffer environmental damage will receive the same environmental protection as was announced this afternoon for those living on new rail routes?

Mr. MacGregor: The normal rules relating to environmental protection and compensation will apply, but we are working with local authorities on arrangements for the type of line that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. I am sure that, if he is anxious to mitigate the problem caused by the amount of traffic from the channel tunnel that travels along the lines between now and the end of the century, he will give all his support to the Government's attempts to secure the Bill's passage.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, although Kent Members and many others will fight for environmental improvements, today's statement and the decision that he has announced will receive a broad welcome, contrasting sharply with the whingeing, carping, negative and destructive attitude of the Labour party? Will he take every opportunity to remind the country that, from the moment that the channel tunnel is opened, it will be possible to catch a train from the new Waterloo terminal and to be in Paris within three hours? I hope that he will deny all the denigrating, knocking stuff that we have heard from Labour.

Will my right hon. Friend explain why he has chosen to use the hybrid Bill procedure rather than the new order-making procedure, which was available to him and which would have provided greater opportunities for public inquiries, including local public inquiries? Does he understand that it is desperately important for Kent's support to know where the new stations will be? That is what will make the railway viable in terms of attracting Kent commuter traffic.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is entirely right about the attitude of the Opposition, who can hardly bring themselves even to welcome a massive investment in Britain's transport infrastructure that will do a great deal for many generations to come. He is also entirely right to make it clear that, when the tunnel opens, it will take just over three hours to travel from London to Paris, and even less to travel from London to Brussels. That is already a substantial benefit, and I think that many people who currently travel to Brussels by air will quickly see the attraction of going by train.

My hon. Friend made two other points. I recognise the force of his comment about stations; that is why I am anxious to provide a comparatively short but reasonable time for public consultation. I hope that six months will be adequate, and will allow us to reach a view on stations.

As for my hon. Friend's other point, I think it right to use the hybrid Bill procedure to deal with a project of such magnitude and scale, which is receiving Government backing. The procedure will still involve a substantial process of investigation as the Bill goes through both Houses.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Does the Secretary of State admit that hon. Members whose constituencies are served by the east coast main line in Yorkshire, the north-east and Scotland consider that the proposal for the preferred route to St. Pancras would be better called "Disunion Railways"? Although the point is never addressed in the document, it is clear that there will be no direct link from the east coast main line to the channel tunnel except by means of shunting through St. Pancras mainline station. Will the Secretary of State deal with that point? Why has it not been considered in any of the documents?

Mr. MacGregor: Because it does not amount to a row of beans. There will be a direct line, and there will be no shunting. The train will have to come into the station and then go out, but that happens on high-speed links all over Europe; there is nothing very significant about it. The train will also have to stop at London, so that crews can change and border control personnel can alight. I do not believe that the system will have any impact on the speed with which passengers from Scotland and the north of England can go straight through the channel tunnel.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that maintaining section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987—which will be of great interest, and give great pleasure, to those who work in Dover's ferry industry in the years ahead—will involve no back-door subsidy through the commuter mechanism, which would contravene that section and the principles behind it? Will he also confirm that money will not be spent on the construction of the rail link until, at long last, my constituents who use the railways to get from Dover to London have some decent rolling stock on which to travel?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I can confirm my hon. Friend's first point: that any Government support will be used entirely to provide internal, domestic benefits for commuters and that international passengers and international services will not be affected by it. Therefore, we shall be meeting our obligations under section 42. As for my hon. Friend's second point, I cannot make a clear correlation between the two, but I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that it is right—because of the benefits to so many people in Kent as well as to the rest of the country—that we ought to proceed with the high-speed rail link as quickly as we reasonably can.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), can the Secretary of State tell the House why the promise that was given in 1991 by his predecessor has been broken—that the line which runs parallel with the north London line should be via tunnels, given that King's Cross and St. Pancras are virtually next door to each other? Once the trains have reached St. Pancras, will the north London line to the west of the station be used to join the west coast mainline, and will tunnelling be excluded there, too?

Mr. MacGregor: On the first part of the hon. Lady's question, from the studies that I have seen so far—clearly, this is something that I have asked Union Railways to look into in more detail—there will be considerable environmental benefits, on balance, from using the existing north London line. Noise mitigation and so on, would all be carried out when the two lines that are not being used at the moment come into use. As for the hon. Lady's second question, the east coast mainline services——

Mr. Prescott: We are talking about the west coast mainline services.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I know, but I want to make a point about the east coast mainline services. The east coast and the west coast mainline services are all important to the north and to Scotland. The east coast mainline services that currently use St. Pancras can be accommodated in a new part of the station, west of the existing King's Cross station. Most west coast mainline services go from Euston. One possibility there is the use of a travelator between St. Pancras and Euston to speed up the connections.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it not a bit insulting to the people of Southend-on-Sea to put part of this glamorous and costly new line alongside the London, Tilbury and Southend line, which, as my right hon. Friend is well aware, is one of the most shamefully neglected of all British Rail's services in terms of investment and performance? Can he provide me with a clear answer as to why he now says that a great deal of taxpayers' money will go towards these rail links when a clear, specific assurance was given on 5 June 1986, in column 1187, that these rail links would not cost the taxpayer one penny, and when we were led to believe that these assurances were legally binding and could not be changed?

Mr. MacGregor: On my hon. Friend's first point, I do not see that it is at all insulting. My hon. Friend knows —I share his view—that it is very important that the London, Tilbury and Southend line infrastructure should be improved. He will also know that very recently, as a result of the public expenditure settlement that I agreed last autumn, British Rail has been able to go ahead with the announcement of a £40 million investment in the signalling on the London, Tilbury and Southend line.

As for my hon. Friend's second point, I can give him an assurance, which I repeat, that there will be no taxpayers' subsidy for the international aspects of this line and that therefore we shall be meeting our obligations under section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunningham, North): Can I place it on record that the comments made by the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) in respect of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) were inaccurate, as I believe the hon. Member for Dartford now recognises? The question is why the Secetary of State could not have made a statement on this subject last Thursday instead of wasting his time in Scotland trying to enthuse people about privatisation, which nobody wants.

Does this statement not represent another example of one story before the election and a different one after it? Is it not true that after all this time there is to be yet another consultation period and yet another decade before there is a high-speed link, even between the channel tunnel and London? Can the Secretary of State confirm that, for purely cost reasons, less than one third of the distance which his predecessor earmarked for tunnelling will now be subject to tunnelling, which will be at the expense of the evironment? Can he also confirm that the distance earmarked for tunnelling will not include Boxley valley?

Does the Secretary of State agree that the real tragedy of the statement is that there is still no national vision for fast rail links north of London? Does he understand that it is not merely a domestic Kent issue—important though such considerations are—but that the rest of the country now awaits a strategy for fast direct links, as opposed to the dog's breakfast and fragmentation which privatisation offer?

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I wanted to make the statement on Wednesday so that the House was informed as quickly as possible. On Thursday, I was fulfilling substantial engagements in Scotland with ScotRail, the Scottish pensioners—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman would have been the first to criticise me if I had not been able to discuss with editors the whole issue of privatisation in Scotland, with Strathclyde PTE and SPEED, an organisation which, as he will know, is concerned with freight movement from Scotland. I was carrying out that extensive programme. He would have been the first to criticise me and would have described it as an insult to the Scots if I had not fulfilled that engagement. I thought that it was extremely important to complete those serious and prolonged discussions with people in Scotland, which I found extremely useful. I also found considerable enthusiasm for privatisation among ScotRail managers.

On delays, Union Railways has produced an excellent, thorough report, and very quickly. I pay substantial tribute to Union Railways for the way in which it carried it out. Once the route was decided—I confirmed it very soon after I became Secretary of State—we asked Union Railways to carry out this work which was essential before we proceeded any further. I presume that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that we should ignore all public consultation and should not have the usual processes of getting parliamentary approval for the project. He will therefore recognise that what we have been doing in the past year is to reach the present stage very quickly, and I intend to continue as fast as we possibly can.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman, as I have already said, that there is a substantial amount of tunnelling. In only one case could there have been environmental advantages from additional tunnelling, which would have meant substantial additional expenditure of between £150 million and £200 million. We decided that the short tunnel route, which is not the cheapest option but which is more expensive than one possibility, was the right one to take.

This is a massive investment of £2·5 billion on track and infrastructure alone. People travelling to the rest of the country will benefit just as much as people from London and the south-east because journeys through the channel tunnel will be cut by 33 minutes. Exactly the same amount of time will be saved.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have not finished. Sir Edward Heath.

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): May I thank my right hon. Friend for the statement, for the grasp that he has shown of the intricacies of this long-running project and for his obvious determination in pushing it ahead? I assure him that the people of Old Bexley and Sidcup will welcome the statement because, although passionately pro-European, they have always preferred that the fast link should run outside their borders.

Nothing, historically, can alter the fact that when the channel tunnel was suggested, British Rail said that no link would be necessary, but in 1985 it said that a link would be necessary. It is now eight years since that statement was made and we are still only in the process of making progress, which, I am afraid, is all too characteristic of the way in which this country tries to move into the modern world.

Will my right hon. Friend kindly enlarge on his statement that section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 will be observed but will not inhibit him? Section 42 was included deliberately to prevent British Rail or other public money from being used for the purposes of looking after the environment on this scheme. As he has emphasised, a great deal is required for the environment and he is sure that it will be covered. Is it to be dealt with by public money?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his opening comments. It has been my intention to move ahead on the matter as fast as we can. I am sure that my right hon. Friend recognises that today's announcement is a very important step forward in the whole process, not least in making clear the Government's determination and in clearing up the blight issues which have affected many people. That is why I was anxious to make my announcement as quickly as possible.

On section 42, the public sector contribution will come through the benefits to domestic commuters and through the services that are provided there. The precise split between the two will have to be decided in due course. I have said that we shall now engage in discussions with the private sector to work out all the arrangements for the joint venture. That will happen in parallel with the public consultation. The important thing today is to get ahead with the public consultation so that we can finally settle the route.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. What does "Erskine May" have to say about "a row of beans" as a parliamentary expression? Would that not give the Secretary of State the opportunity to clarify exactly what he meant when he replied to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins)? Those of us who are concerned about the northern link want the Secretary of State to clarify why it should take no more time than was previously promised.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is attempting to continue the exchange. I must tell him that "time's up" means "time's up".

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not want to continue questions on the statement, but I must point out that the Secretary of State failed to mention the country outside London. As a result of pressures on time, only two speakers from north of London were called. What opportunities will those of us who represent those areas, for which the link is crucial, have to put points and to have them answered by the Secretary of State?

Madam Speaker: I recognise that the matter is crucial to hon. Members, including myself, who represent constituencies outside London. As the Secretary of State said, there is to be an intensive consultation process. I hope that hon. Members can have an input there. It is true that I was not able to call the number of hon. Members who represent constituencies outside London whom I wished to call. I am afraid that questions on statements must sometimes be curtailed. I have to draw a distinction between the statement and today's other important business, with which we shall now proceed.

Ministerial Patronage (Parliamentary Scrutiny)

4.31 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock and Burntwood): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for ministerial appointments to public bodies to be subject to a Parliamentary scrutiny and confirmation process through Select Committees.

The Bill is about patronage—the patronage powers of Ministers and of the Prime Minister to appoint people to public posts. My contention is that those powers are excessive, often inefficient and frequently abused. The Bill is designed to make the patronage powers of Ministers more accountable to Parliament and to parliamentary scrutiny.

The issue has a long history. From the 18th century onwards, Parliament has been fighting for its rights against Ministers who have deployed the armoury of patronage and prerogative powers to bribe and buy their way through the House. The subject invites a certain delicacy. Patronage has been described as second only to the act of love in conferring pleasure on all parties concerned. Twenty years ago, Lord Rothschild's central policy review staff studied the matter. Later, he said:

"I thought I detected some resistance on the part of the authorities to the Think Tank studying the subject . . . patronage is a very precious and delicate commodity."

It is surely time to stop being coy about the matter. There is widespread concern in the House and in the country about the matter—and rightly so. At general elections, people think that they are electing a Government. What they do not realise is that they are also releasing the floodgates of ministerial patronage, which will sweep over and dominate the daily government of their lives.

This is the appointive state—non-elected, non-accountable and full of people, chiefly men, whose main and sometimes only qualification is to be acceptable to the Ministers who appoint them. There are currently more than 40,000 public appointments in the gift of Ministers, with the Prime Minister himself standing at the apex of this pyramid of privilege.

I recently asked the Prime Minister in a written question to reveal how many public appointments he controls. Back came those immortal words:

"The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 34.]

I suggest that there is now a disproportionate cost to our democracy in leaving such patronage unchecked. The present Government did not invent patronage. The last Labour Government made liberal use of it. What the present Government have done is to give it a crudely partisan twist. Out went the great and the good; in came those who passed the "one of us" test. A survey by the BBC in 1985 revealed that a quarter of the chairmen of a selection of major public bodies were openly Conservative supporters. A similar survey by the Financial Times earlier this year concluded:

"if there is a new elite running Britain's public services . . . it appears the best qualifications to join are to be a businessman with Conservative leanings."

That is manifestly so in the new trustified health service, while it is widely understood in Wales that the most secure route to public appointment is to be an unsuccessful Conservative candidate.

There is a problem about democracy here; there is a problem about efficiency, too. To take two recent examples, it is not immediately apparent that efficient management has been the hallmark either of the just-surviving chairman of the BBC or of the recently departing chair of the West Midlands regional health authority, both of them political patronage appointments. Last year The Times noted:

"Mrs. Thatcher's approach to patronage was the simple rule: those who are not with me are against me."

The Times went on to observe:

"A more tolerant use of patronage could spread the art of Government beyond a partisan ruling elite, and raise the quality of institutional debate. To exclude talented administrators and wise old heads just because they are of the wrong political colour is to impoverish political life."

Hon. Members may have noted that I have avoided the dreaded word "quango". I have done so deliberately. There is nothing quasi-autonomous and certainly nothing non-governmental about the public bodies to which I refer. We need a new word. I suggest that we call them "patronage bodies"—perhaps "patbods" for short—so that everyone can understand what they are really about.

As patronage bodies become ever more important—as elective government is increasingly replaced by appointive government—so control, too, becomes more important. The quango cull of the early 1980s has been overtaken by the patbod growth that has followed it. The advisory committee on Hadrian's wall may have been swept away, but in have come the agencies, commissions, trusts, councils, authorities and corporations that now dominate public administration on every side.

Such bodies now account for more than a fifth of total public spending—20 per cent. more in real terms than in 1979. What distinguishes them all is the fact that they are the creatures of Ministers, and that they exist in a no-man's land of non-accountability inhabited not by the elected but by the selected.

As a recent report from the European Policy Forum —a voice not of the left but of the right—pointed out, all this represents a major transformation in our system of government. The question is whether Parliament will now take up where the 18th-century radicals left off and assert its rights in relation to the patronage state.

This is not a partisan issue. It turns on the age-old question whether there should properly be power without accountability. The Bill embodies the belief that there should not. The modest proposal contained in it is that significant ministerial appointments should be scrutinised and approved by Select Committees of this House. That would convert patronage bodies into public bodies. It would also represent an affirmation of the rights of this House in relation to the arbitrary powers claimed by the Executive.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Tony Wright, Mr. Malcolm Wicks, Mrs. Bridget Prentice, Mrs. Anne Campbell, Mr. Nick Raynsford, Mr. Cynog Dafis, Mr. Calum Macdonald, Ms Estelle Morris and Mr. John Garrett.

MINISTERIAL PATRONAGE (PARLIAMENTARY SCRUTINY)

Dr. Tony Wright accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for ministerial appointments to public bodies to be subject to a Parliamentary scrutiny and confirmation process through Select Committees: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 March, and to be printed. [Bill 166.]

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [16 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies, acquisitions and importations; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lamont.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 4683/93, the Commission's Annual Economic Report for 1993, and the draft Decision adopting the Report.]

Madam Speaker: I draw the attention of the House to the fact that I must impose a 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 9 pm.

4.40 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): The Budget sets in place one more step in our strategy for industry. When coupled with the autumn statement, it must be seen as a comprehensive response to our industrial needs. First, it provides a sound economic background against which our companies can more effectively enhance their competitiveness. Secondly, it backs our drive on the export markets. Thirdly, it addreses a range of specific measures that industry has raised with us. Fourthly, it recognises the vital role that small and medium-sized firms play in economic vitality.

No Government have done more to create a favourable climate for enterprise and wealth creation. Interest rates have been cut by 9 per cent. As a consequence, industry's costs have been reduced by £11 billion a year. The Government's privatisation programme is perhaps one of the most radical changes in the United Kingdom's economic and industrial structure since 1945.

In 1978-79, the nationalised industries received subsidies of some £2·2 billion in today's prices. In contrast, in 1990-91, the privatised companies paid £3 billion to the Exchequer. The privatised industries are achieving striking improvements in productivity. British Airways has increased its productivity by more than 20 per cent. The number of customers per employee in respect of British Gas has increased by about 19 per cent. Productivity at British Steel, which is now considered to be one of the world's most efficient steel producers, has increased dramatically. It now takes only 4·8 man hours to produce a tonne of liquid steel, compared with 13·2 man hours in 1979-80.

Those improvements in productivity have been passed on to consumers as lower prices and rising standards of service. Since privatisation, gas prices have fallen by 18 per cent. for domestic customers and by 40 per cent. for large industrial customers. Those industries are, in many cases, now acting as flagships for Britain in overseas markets.

During the Prime Minister's visit to India last month, British Gas signed an agreement with the Gas Authority of India enabling both companies to take gas from offshore Bombay and send it through a new distribution network to more than 60,000 offices, factories and homes.

In Argentina, British Gas has won a $300 million contract to replace the Buenos Aires distribution system. The company is working as far afield as Indonesia and Kazakhstan. It is developing the Uisker oil field in Tunisia and converting the German town of Spremberg to natural gas.

Since privatisation, Rolls-Royce——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The Secretary of State has mentioned gas and electricity and there is much confusion in people's minds outside this place. Will the Government fully compensate pensioners, and particularly those on very low incomes, in respect of the imposition of VAT? Is it not necessary for the Government to be quite clear, before the vote at 10 pm, precisely what is to be done, bearing in mind the tremendous hardship and misery that so many people on low incomes already face when they pay their heating bills during the winter months?

Mr. Heseltine: Of course that is important and that is why the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the position clear in his Budget statement and why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister built on what the Chancellor had said when he addressed the House last Thursday. I will return to that subject when I reach that part of my speech.

As I was saying, since Rolls-Royce was privatised in 1987, its share of the world civil engine market has risen from 10 per cent. to no less than 22 per cent. Its aero-engine order book has more than doubled and currently stands at £6·7 billion. More than 70 per cent. of its output is exported. Its industrial and marine activities are also world wide. It recently won power supply contracts worth £67 million in India and the subsidiary, NEI Parsons, secured a £100 million contract for turbines in Singapore.

Ten years ago, British cars were hardly seen on the streets of Tokyo. In 1991, Rover exported 10,000 vehicles to Japan. The company produced 395,000 vehicles in 1991, of which about 40 per cent. went overseas, the bulk to other members of the single market.

As I said in the House last week, British Telecom is now one of the world's foremost telecommunications companies. Last year, it won a £350 million contract to install a network for the New South Wales Government.

Our water companies are making formidable strides in overseas markets. Thames Water is expected to sign a contract for £450 million for a water supply scheme in Izmit in Turkey to build, operate for 15 years and then transfer the scheme to the Turkish Government.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): What about the unemployed in Dock road, Tilbury? What about real people?

Mr. Heseltine: I heard the hon. Gentleman say, "What about real people?" Does the hon. Gentleman believe that real people do not work for those real companies? What sort of real people does the hon. Gentleman have in mind if people who export for Britain and design and manufacture for Britain are not considered by the Labour party to be real people? I suppose that, in the language of the Labour party, the real people are those who disrupt industrial relations, try to undermine Britain and talk the nation down: the real people of the left; yesterday's real people.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heseltine: Here is one of them. One of yesterday's real people stands before us.

Mr. Skinner: As a matter of fact, I am making inquiries about today's real people. The Secretary of State knows as well as I do that the mining industry could do with participating in the exports to which he referred. After a 15 to 20 per cent. reduction in the value of the pound, we could be exporting coal and today's real miners could be taking part in that.

Will the Secretary of State tell us today that the 20 million tonnes of coal imported into Britain will be massively reduced and that he will launch an export drive for coal? If we are exporting all those things to all those parts of the world, why has there been a announcement today of an increase in the balance of payments monthly deficit of £1·3 billion?

Mr. Heseltine: I can help the hon. Gentleman. Yes, we can export coal the day that we produce it at a price which the export market will absorb. If the hon. Gentleman had put his mind years ago to advising his constituents about the productivity gains that we are beginning to see in the mining industry, we might not have these imports of foreign coal. The price that we have paid for the views expressed by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and his right hon. and hon. Friends and their failure to bring home the realities of a competitive marketplace to the miners of this country is now being visited on those very people.

Thames Water, as I said, expects to sign a contract for £450 million. Anglian Water has won a stake in a winning consortium for a Buenos Aires water privatisation project. North West Water, in conjunction with an Australian engineering firm, has signed a contract for 100 million Australian dollars to improve water quality in Melbourne.

That is a remarkable transformation. Not only are those privatised companies no longer loss making, in tax terms, but they are paying large sums of money to the Exchequer. They are now winning for Britain in a way in which, for the past 30 or 40 years, we denied them the opportunity even to try to.

I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) is in his place at the moment.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way before he goes off on one of those manic, last deckchair attendant on the Titanic performances. Does he not realise that the reason why the water companies are able to make flash investments in places such as Turkey and New South Wales has nothing to do with the technology which they have to offer? It has everything to do with the guaranteed and ludicrously high prices which they are allowed to charge by the over-generous terms on which they were privatised by the Government in 1989. As a result of having that guaranteed income, the companies can spend overseas the capital which they have accumulated from the ordinary water and sewerage users in the United Kingdom. It is capital which we, the taxpayers, have provided. It is nothing to do with the skills of the companies.

Mr. Heseltine: Here we have the revisited Labour party. This is the Labour party which does not want to see real people involved in making real products. We now have a new concept: if a privatised British company goes out and wins in the marketplace of the world, somehow it is doing so because it is taking on loss-making contracts. That is what the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) said. British companies are not winning on their merits. They are winning contracts because, somehow or other, they are being artificially supported in the domestic marketplace.

What sort of message does the hon. Gentleman think that he is sending to countries that are considering taking British tenders? The message has come from the British Labour party that it is a giant fix—that these are not competitive tenders but have all been sorted out on the back of the domestic market by the British Government.

I hope that all those people out there who are selling for Britain are listening to this debate and to the support that they are getting from the Labour party in the House. Labour Members of the revitalised Labour party say that they are backing Britain. They are backing Britain everywhere except when it comes to winning contracts in the overseas marketplace. If the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) were here today——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Get on with it!

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman should not worry: I shall get on with it. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said:

> "The central questions are how we invest in people for the future, how we invest in industry and how we invest in the social and economic fabric of our country to ensure that we will have not only rising production in industry but rising standards of living."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 296.]

That was the great sort of interrogation to which the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary were subjected by the hon. Gentleman.

What is happening to improve the living standards? What are the facts? As a result of the changes which I have been talking about, real spending on the national health service in England has increased by 60 per cent. since 1979. There are 19,000 more doctors and dentists and almost 38,000 more nurses and midwives, and 45 per cent. more acute in-patients and day cases are treated each year.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Real doctors, real nurses, real patients.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right: this is another example of real people doing real things because a Tory Government have made it possible.

The investment programme in the privatised water industry is heading for an additional £30 billion by the end of the century. There has been record public expenditure on roads and the urban programme has been transformed. The essence of the matter is that, while Labour Members continue to talk about these problems, the Tory Government continue to do something about them. There has been much comment about the Chancellor's commitment to extend VAT to fuel bills. That applies with a rate of 8 per cent. in the year starting 1994 and moves to the full rate in April 1995. The Chancellor made his position clear in his Budget speech. On Thursday, the Prime Minister told the House that there would be extra help for less well-off pensioners and other people on low incomes. They will get the extra help from next April before the higher fuel bills come in. That help will be additional to the future increases in pensions and other benefits which will take place automatically. Cold weather payments will also be adjusted to reflect increases in fuel costs.

I was intrigued to read in The Observer that the Chancellor and I were engaged in a furious row on the subject. Apparently, I was furious that I had not been consulted. Perhaps I may say a word about the matter. I was consulted in an orderly way. I made no protest, for the simplest of all reasons—I shared the Chancellor's judgment that it was necessary to raise taxes in the Budget.

Of course any tax increases are likely to be difficult, but, frankly, I am not prepared to cop out of the difficult tax decisions on the most contemptible of arguments—that I agree with what the Chancellor is doing in principle, but I disagree with some specific examples of the difficult decisions which he must take. That is the sort of stuff of which Opposition arguments are made. That is the sort of argument which the Labour party relishes. Indeed, it is the sort of argument which keeps Labour Members pinned to the Opposition Benches.

Why did not The Observer take the trouble to check the facts about this great row between me and the Chancellor? It cannot be because it did not know exactly how to get hold of me. That cannot be the case, because I received a telephone call from The Observer on Saturday wanting to take my photograph. The House will be delighted that I turned down that extremely generous offer. If the picture editor of The Observer knows how to find me, is it too much to think that the serried ranks of industrial and political correspondents somehow cannot manage the same trick—or were they frightened that, if they put to me the straight question, they would get the truth and the truth would deny them any sort of headline at all?

I can see that this will be the revisiting of the inglorious past of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). This afternoon he will be in his element. If ever there was a story tailor-made for the hon. Gentleman, this is that story. There are millions of pensioners to frighten and spectres of ill-health and hardship to conjure up. The hon. Gentleman knows the arguments backwards, because, over the years, he has invented most of the arguments backwards. He is the seasoned practitioner on whom all those people out there will wish to make a judgment.

In The Times of 14 December 1987, the hon. Gentleman described the Government's intentions as to "leave the NHS as a ghetto service for those who are too poor to afford anything better".

In The Times of 1 February 1989, he said of GP budget holders:

"For the first time, GPs will have an incentive to turn away patients with a high price tag, the elderly, the disabled and the chronically sick."

In The Independent of 5 October 1990, he spoke of "an NHS in which pensioners queue up for their operations in an end-of-season sale".

What happened? All the trusts are still in the public sector, and 1 million more patients are being treated than when the hon. Gentleman was making his statements. The hon. Gentleman is a man with a record. He has been through it all before. He should be judged by how true it all turned out to be.

I took a little time off last Wednesday to listen to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, and I am glad to welcome him to our deliberations today. Some of us had the privilege to watch him. He was at his most ferocious. Psychologically, the red flag was up—I see that it is round his neck today. Red blood was flowing all over the carpets as he ended his speech with these fighting words:

"There is no one left for this Government to betray; they have no credibility in this country. The electorate will never trust them again. If Britain is to have a new start, it will need a new Government—and that will be a Labour Government." —[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 298.]

Trust a Labour Government! In September 1964, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Wilson, said:

"Over the period of a Parliament I believe that we can carry out our programme without any general increase in taxation."

When that Government left office, they were collecting £2 for every £1 collected when their promise was made. In the same election campaign, the late George Brown—[Interruption.] Oh yes. Opposition Members may laugh now. I know that it is a long time ago, but it is a long time since we had a Labour Government. The reason why it is a long time is because the Labour party said these preposterous things and was found out.

The late George Brown said:

"For new mortgages we have something in mind of the order of 3 per cent."

By the time that Government left office, mortgage rates were 8·5 per cent. By the late 1960s we had the then Prime Minister, Lord Wilson, proclaiming on 17 April 1969:

"The Industrial Relations Bill is an essential Bill, essential to full employment and essential too for the Government's continuation in office."

On 18 June 1969, the Bill was withdrawn from the legislative programme.

For those who are interested in the flights of fancy of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East about trusting a Labour Government, what about all the bravura claim in October 1964:

"Labour will abolish poverty in Britain"?

Six years later, the Child Poverty Action Group had sadly to conclude:

"in many ways the plight of poor families is now worse than when the Labour Government took office."

Worse it was, worse and always it will be. Trusting the Labour party is not a matter of investing in risk. It is a matter of investing in certainty. All out. All up. All over.

The hon. Member for Bolsover asked a question about coal. I recognise, as will the House, that there has been much speculation in recent days about the coal contracts. Some progress has been made in respect of the base contracts. Work has continued now through several weekends. I hope that I am about to be able to report on the position. I hope that I may be able to do that in the not-too-distant future. However, as I have said many times, I have no powers to make people sign contracts. In the meantime, I have agreed that British Coal can extend the redundancy terms until the end of December this year.

Increases in productivity are often accompanied by falls in employment. We have had to face that problem in the coal industry over many years. But we are familiar with the general trend throughout manufacturing industry. Indeed, manufacturing employment peaked as far back as 1966. That phenomenon is not confined to the United Kingdom. Some decline in employment in manufacturing is evident in most industrial countries.

Increased competition and continuing technical progress mean that many firms will reduce employment to stay competitive. That does not mean that those firms are in difficulties. Far from it. The vehicle industry in the United Kingdom is producing 300,000 more vehicles a year than 10 years ago, but it employs 100,000 fewer people. The paper, printing and publishing industries increased their output by more than a quarter between 1980 and 1991, but employment fell by 12 per cent.

In many industries, successful firms are cutting jobs as they invest for the future to stay ahead of the competition. New firms and new businesses were the key to employment growth in the 1980s and they are undoubtedly the area of the economy to which we must look for new jobs in the future. We have been more successful in job creation than other European Community countries. The work force in employment grew by almost 1·5 million over the last economic cycle, between 1979 and 1990, so it is of critical importance that we recognise that every degree of support that we can give to new companies is most relevant to creating new jobs and new opportunities in our economy.

The next matter of dramatic importance in what we seek to achieve and must achieve is support for our export companies. Our companies know that there is no such thing as a secure market. Overseas firms face the same pressure to win as we do. We are pushing forward with fresh initiatives to help exporters.

Last November the Minister for Trade announced an export strategy to maximise our strengths and minimise our weaknesses. I have invited British companies to second to my Department 100 men and women to help us in the promotion of our exports. I am extremely gratified by the response that I am achieving. I believe that we shall have 100 such people by the summer of this year. That will give us experts with first-hand knowledge of overseas markets who will aim to identify and promote opportunities to help our companies to fulfil their potential.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that our exporters are doing a fantastic job, but is not the United Kingdom's problem the fact that we import too much? Do we not have a cultural problem? A large part of the British buying public still believes that it is smarter or better to buy foreign, even when British goods are competitive and of the right quality.

I give my right hon. Friend an example from my constituency. I represent more pigs than people. We produce the finest pigmeat in the world. British charter bacon is of top quality and is internationally competitive. Yet 50 per cent. of the bacon bought by housewives is from Holland or Denmark. Is not that a national disgrace?

Mr. Heseltine: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety. That is why I was delighted to notice the seminar which my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, with leaders in both the retail and producing sectors of the food industry, held recently to address some of those difficult issues. As my hon. Friend says, that part of our economy is particularly important because it represents one of the largest deficits in our balance of trade.

The Budget of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will help business build on the achievements of the 1980s. It will promote the economic recovery by providing concrete benefits for business and a stable framework for business decisions. His Budget has successfully combined three aims, at least two of which were widely said to be incompatible before he rose last Tuesday and showed how it could be done. His Budget has avoided damaging the inevitably fragile early stages of recovery; it has achieved a substantial improvement in the public finances into the medium term; and it has done all this while keeping inflation within clearly defined limits. All three aims, and especially the continued control of inflation, are of vital importance to business.

We now hear less than we did two or three years ago about short-termism as a feature of our industrial and commercial life. To a large extent, this is because we have got inflation down, yet I do not doubt for one moment that deep-seated short-term attitudes are prevalent in our affairs; or that this is one important strand in understanding why we as a nation have performed less well than many of our competitors.

Such attitudes have led us to invest less than we might in technology and advanced means of production. They have encouraged growth in companies by acquisition and financial engineering, rather than through organic development and building on products and markets. They have led us to place far too great an emphasis on comparisons of near-term financial results in judging our companies, instead of considering the strength of management and its underlying strategy.

Those attitudes are all of a piece. They reflect much that is cultural, and they can be changed only slowly. But they have one great mechanism of reinforcement—inflation. Inflation is an evil which narrows the focus of attention into the short term. Inflation must be kept low in the years to come if our performance is to be improved. The Budget measures will reduce burdens on business by £1 billion in the year ahead. They will assist small and medium enterprises to do what they do best—create the wealth on which the rest of the country depends.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): On that specific point, can the President of the Board of Trade say why the Chancellor did not introduce a statutory requirement to pay interest on late payment of debt? That would have helped small businesses considerably.

Mr. Heseltine: We have no doctrinal view on that measure, but there are many doubts about whether it would have the effect that the hon. Lady suggests. We have discussed the matter. My noble Friend Lady Denton has exercised significant influence on late payment of debts. There has been a substantial improvement in the rate of payment. Not the least reason for that is that the Government have paid their bills in a timely way and encouraged large companies to do the same. My noble Friend has made it clear that she will take up specific cases if they are drawn to her attention.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I wish it were true that Government Departments had been settling their bills promptly. The Public Accounts Committee took evidence from the Property Services Agency, which was only paying when it received payment, and I shall shortly be criticising that strongly.

Mr. Heseltine: I fully acknowledge the high position of responsibility that the right hon. Gentleman has in our affairs. If he has examples that my Department should explore, I assure him that we shall do so, as that is an important matter. We have tried to do what we can to speed up payments, but we are aware that a statutory process might not improve matters in the way that people think, and have therefore hesitated to move in that direction.

For the second year running, no business will face a real increase in its rates bill. The package of value added tax measures introduced by the Chancellor will also be welcomed by every small firm. Finance for small businesses—a subject of great concern—will also be given a boost by the changes in premiums and loan size limits, under the small firms loan guarantee scheme. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has thrown a challenge to the banks. The Government have taken an initiative and it is now up to the banks to judge business plans and to make their loans in a way that will help businesses to grow.

The changes to capital gains tax will encourage reinvestment by not penalising those who use their profits to start another business.

I have referred to the need to help exporters. We are making available an additional £1·3 billion of cover for key markets. Together with the changes in the autumn statement that will mean that annual cover for United Kingdom exporters in priority markets will have increased by more than 75 per cent. in just four years. Premium rates have also been cut and are now more than 25 per cent. lower than in 1991-92. Those reductions will bring the average level of premiums charged in the United Kingdom down to around the average charged by the United Kingdom's competitors.

The Chancellor announced a special scheme in the Budget to help persuade foreign-owned companies to choose the United Kingdom as a location for international headquarters companies. The present advance corporation tax rules are an obstacle to their doing so. The new rules, which will be implemented next year, will remove that obstacle, which should attract new business to the United Kingdom, and bolster London's role as Europe's premier financial centre.

I know that oil companies have always recognised the responsiveness and stability that our North sea tax regime offers. However, the petroleum revenue tax regime was introduced in 1975, with the last substantial amendment in 1983. In keeping the tax system under review, it was important to keep in mind the fact that the North sea was maturing as an oil province—new fields tend to be smaller, and older fields are gradually declining. The Chancellor has now reduced petroleum revenue tax from 75 to 50 per cent. for existing fields from 1 July 1993, and abolished the tax for future fields given development consent on or after 16 March. The Chancellor's proposals move the North sea from a high-tax to a low-tax regime.

Conditions for recovery are in place. The United Kingdom has the lowest inflation rate for 25 years; the lowest interest rates since 1977; and the lowest base rates in the European Community. Interest rates have fallen by nine percentage points since autumn 1990, knocking £11 billion a year off industry's costs.

We have a fiercely competitive exchange rate; a set of Budget measures to boost confidence and stimulate growth; and confidence is rising. The Confederation of British Industry, the chambers of commerce and the Institute of Directors show rising confidence in their surveys. Retail sales are at record levels; car sales are up sharply; manufacturing investment in the fourth quarter of 1992 was up by 5·5 per cent. on the start of the year; the increase in average earnings is the lowest for 25 years and we expect a further decline in the coming months.

Rapid productivity growth means that United Kingdom manufacturing unit wage costs are lower than those in Germany or Japan, on recent OECD estimates, and they have fallen during the past 12 months. However, further pay restraint is vital to maximise the competitive advantages of sterling depreciation. This month's fall in unemployment is welcome, but too much should not be read into one month's figures, as the fall might not be immediately sustained and it may be some time before the underlying trend takes a downward turn. Unemployment is likely to be one of the last indicators to respond to any recovery in the economy.

Exports and productivity are at record levels and Britain is moving ahead. British business now has clear advantages in competing in the rest of the world.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): While I agree with all that my right hon. Friend is saying, does he agree that the rules and regulations affecting small firms prevent them from competing with other countries on that famous level playing field? Something needs to be done to reduce the number of rules and regulations affecting small firms. Can he tell the House what the deregulation unit is doing about future and existing regulations, which are preventing the recovery that small firms so badly need?

Mr. Heseltine: As my hon. Friend knows, we have started to review proposed regulations and those already on the statute book and are applying the review to domestic and European Community regulations. We have been fortunate in securing the services of Lord Sainsbury and those of various other chairmen and significant figures from the private sector, who have helped us to establish seven task forces, to consider the 7,000 existing regulations, which obviously create the climate in which industry has to operate. I shall report to the House as progress takes place.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath) rose——

Mr. Heseltine: I shall not give way.

I assure the House that in all those ways the Government will play their full part to help the private sector in difficult circumstances.

As I told the House in a recent debate, we live in a competitive world. As we export such a high proportion of our output, it is impossible to believe that we can operate as an island economy. We are broadly comparable with many economies in the world. During the past year industrial production has fallen by 2 per cent. in Italy, by 2·5 per cent. in France, by 6·5 per cent. in Germany and by 7 per cent. in Japan, but in this country industrial production has risen in that period.

Japanese gross domestic product fell by 0·75 per cent. in the second half of 1992, output fell in France and Italy and there were three successive quarters of decline in Germany. Since 1981—the trough of the last recession—United Kingdom manufacturing output has risen by more than a fifth, manufacturing investment is up by nearly two fifths and manufacturing productivity by two thirds. Our export volumes are at an all-time high and by the end of 1990 there were about 400,000 more businesses operating in this country than in 1979.

The underlying strength of our manufacturing base can also be seen from our ability to attract inward investment. In 1991, we attracted one third of all inward investment into the European Community.

So, as we have said many times, despite the severity and length of the recession, Britain is in a strong position to take advantage of prevailing domestic and world economic circumstances. That can be done only by making this country's economy competitive, which can be achieved only by the relentless grind on costs and the pursuit of improved quality.

The Opposition are incapable of understanding those arguments, and view the British economy as an island apart from international pressures and the international marketplace. They keep peddling their view of an industrial strategy, which is simple and based on clear but irrelevant ideas: higher taxes to finance higher public expenditure; bigger training budgets; pushing up education standards; helping workers with statutory rights; and embracing the social chapter. They have pursued all those ideas in France, where their income taxes are higher and their education system renowned. They have extensive public ownership and have turned the social chapter into a Domesday book. What has happened under one of Europe's most substantial socialist Governments? The people living under it are sick to death of what is happening.

The French election result, if replicated in this country, would take a scythe to the parliamentary Labour party. It would be down to a rump of about 10 people; the impregnable Labour strongholds might be all that would be left if we had a Labour socialist Government. What would that Government look like? Perhaps the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) would be Foreign Secretary; the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) would be Chancellor of the Exchequer; the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) would be Home Secretary; and presumably there would be an early return to the Front Bench for the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) as Secretary of State for Wales. We could count on the fact that the hon. Member for Bolsover would be there clambering on to any convenient barricade, searching for a starring role in "Les Miserables". What a brilliant piece of casting that would be, but it would be casting in the world of make-believe. The Budget contains real policies for the real world; I commend it to the House.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): For the second time in a fortnight, the President of the Board of Trade has used a speech on the economy to make a statement on his energy review. For the second time, the statement that he made about that review consisted of things that he cannot do to save coal pits. The nation is tired of hearing what he cannot do to help the miners; what we are still waiting to hear, after six months, is what he will do to help them.

Every time the right hon. Gentleman rules out another solution to the problem, as he did today, he confirms what we have always warned about: that the immense flaw in the structure of that review is that the man in charge of finding a solution that avoids closing the 31 pits is the same man who thought it was the right course in the first place. I must warn the right hon. Gentleman that he is coming dangerously close to admitting that he has wasted six months in coming to the conclusion that he was right all along and everybody else was wrong.

If the President of the Board of Trade wishes to be remembered as the man who closed down Britain's coal industry, the Chancellor will be remembered for his 1993 Budget. It was quite the most dramatic Budget since 1988, when Lord Lawson eyed up a overheated economy and poured petrol over it, creating a rip-roaring runaway boom which burnt itself out and left his successors sitting among the ashes—except for the President of the Board of Trade: he does not notice them.

As I listened to right hon. Gentleman's speech, as he fumbled among the ashes of the Government's industrial and economic performance, I heard him describe them as a bonfire of success. I started to convince myself that the trade gap must be a statistical error, that job losses from companies and manufacturing industry are a sign of their success. I must say that I was saved from giving in to the right hon. Gentleman once his speech finally orbited out of touch with ground control and reality and he blamed my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) for the 1964 Labour manifesto.

I admire my hon. Friend and I have known him for 25 years—he was precocious even then, as a student—but I must admit to the right hon. Gentleman that, having known my hon. Friend that long, I know that he did not write the 1964 Labour manifesto. I predict that, 30 years from now, my hon. Friend will be sitting below the Gangway dignifying the Labour Bench and recalling to the House how the 1993 Budget swept him into the Treasury and Labour into office.

What makes this Budget dramatic is the admission of the damage the Government have done to the economy. No plea of guilty has been entered, and nobody has even said sorry, in three days of debate. No request has been made for 14 years of other offences to be taken into consideration.

But the admission was there in the lengthy speech of the Chancellor, which revealed the embarrassing and painful decisions forced on him by the severity of our economic recession. It is there in the thick Red Book that charts the bleak economic problems of the future. It was there in the admission of the damage that proved the curtain raiser to the Budget—the report specially commissioned by the President of the Board of Trade, which was leaked to The Sunday Times the Sunday before the Budget.

That report, from the competitiveness unit of the DTI, said that our industrial base is fundamentally weak, that our trade deficit will last for decades and that, instead of putting in place the conditions for recovery to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, the Government have put in place low investment and low skills in industry.

Many Opposition Members share the distress that the right hon. Gentleman must have felt at people employed by the Government talking Britain down in that way. For that reason, last week, I asked the right hon. Gentleman to publish that report in full, or at least put a chained copy in the Library. He said that he could not publish it because "the report clearly reveals the devastating inheritance of 1979".—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 282.] That is why he could not publish it. He does not want to embarrass us; he wants to spare our feelings. I must say that that is not a sensitivity I had associated with the right hon. Gentleman before.

We know what the inheritance of 1979 was. It was manufacturing investment at 3·9 per cent., of GDP, a level the Government have never once returned to in 14 years in office. The legacy of 1979 was a surplus of £2·5 billion in manufacturing trade compared with a deficit of £7·5 billion last year. The legacy of 1979 was an unemployment rate of 1·1 million, which the Government have turned into an unemployment level of 3 million—and never in one month, in 14 years, have they got unemployment back to the figure with which they started. That is the inheritance of 1979.

The reason that the President of the Board of Trade is afraid to publish that report and shrinks from doing so is that it spells out the legacy of 1990, which they inherited from themselves. It confirms that, after 14 unbroken years in office, they have achieved industrial production with the lowest growth rate in Europe except for Greece, a manufacturing investment level lower than when they started in 1979, and a proportion of the work force with skills at half the level of other countries. That is the background aganinst which this Budget must be judged.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): The hon. Gentleman is always very selective with his memory. Does he not remember that, in 1978, the previous Labour Government, against a backdrop of doubling unemployment and the collapse of manufacturing industry, commissioned the Finniston inquiry, which highlighted all our long-term failings to compete with our continental partners in the manufacturing and engineering industries?

Mr. Cook: My breath is taken away from me when I hear a Conservative Member complain that the previous Labour Government doubled unemployment. When they left office, the unemployment rate stood at 1·1 million and was coming down; the Government have twice taken it up to 3 million.

If the hon. Gentleman wishes to accuse me of selective use of statistics, it is particularly interesting that, in his selective use of them, he did not choose to express concern about the 68 per cent. rise in unemployment in his own constituency since the Prime Minister took office. If he is worried about rising unemployment, why does he not do his constituents the justice of expressing some concern on behalf of the 3,000 constituents who are now unemployed?

Dr. Hampson: That is the wrong Leeds constituency, mate.

Mr. Cook: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, in the event that we have the wrong figure, I assure him that I will give him the correct figure very shortly.

We have dealt with the inheritance of 1979 and 1990. What this Budget must be judged against is the background of 14 years in which the Government have run down industry. Judged against that background, the Budget fails to meet the test of what is needed by industry. Industrialists have already returned their verdict. Neil Johnson, the director general of the Engineering Employers Federation, said:

"This Budget does nothing to bring about the massive switch to investment which is essential for lasting recovery."

The representatives of the Machine Tool Technologies Association have said:

"This Budget fell short of directly encouraging UK companies to invest."

We do not need to look outside the Government for those who tell us that the Government's policies in the Budget are failing industry. We can see the verdict returned in the Red Book. We only have to look at the contents of the Red Book to see the extent to which the Budget does not stimulate industry. My hon. Friends should handle the Red Book with caution, as it has never yet got it right. It has always erred on the side of unsupported cheerfulness and presented a best case scenario. Whatever the Government say in the Red Book, experience always turns out to be worse than the promises, which are bad enough.

If the President of the Board of Trade wishes to tackle me about talking Britain down, he should note that it was not me who made the forecasts—they were deposited by the Economic Secretary. If the President fears another fit of moral indignation coming over him about people talking Britain down, he should take out his feelings on the Economic Secretary instead of me

Before I turn to the financial statement and the Red Book I shall correct the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson). He was wrong—the increase in unemployment in his constituency since November 1990 is 68 per cent., and unemployment currently stands at 3,264. I now fully understand why the hon. Gentleman did not refer to unemployment in his constituency—he does not even know the unemployment figures for his constituency.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Mr. Cook: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, as it was perfectly clear that I was referring to the increase in unemployment since November 1990. If the hon. Gentleman does not know the increase in unemployment in his constituency since November 1990, I suggest that he does us all a favour, returns to the jobcentres in his constituency tonight and gives us an extra chance to beat the Government.

Dr. Hampson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For the record of the House, the hon. Gentleman chose a particularly——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. What is the point of order for the Chair?

Dr. Hampson: For the Official Report to be accurate, I should say that the hon. Gentleman chose a particularly good year, when unemployment was low.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that that is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Cook: I chose the month in which the present Prime Minister took office, which was not a particularly good month for Britain, but that was the base that was inherited.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Mr. Cook: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but we cannot have a private conversation; I must return to the debate.

The Red Book shows that, in 1993 business investment is expected to fall for the fourth successive year. Ours is the only country in Europe in which business investment will have fallen for four consecutive years. Other countries worry about recession when the rate of growth in investment is not as fast as usual. The Government are so desperate that they claim a recovery when the rate of decline in investment is not as fast as usual.

According to the Red Book, the consequence of the decline in business investment means that, in 1994, manufacturing output will be growing more slowly than in the rest of the economy. Since 1990, manufacturing output has collapsed faster than the rest of the economy. Now that the Government are claiming recovery, the growth in manufacturing output is expected to be slower than the rest of the economy. So much for the Prime Minister's passionate belief in expanding the manufacturing sector. According to the Red Book, the manufacturing sector will continue to decline as a proportion of gross domestic product.

Any lingering hope that the Budget is a Budget for industry or that the Government believe that their Budget will stimulate industry vanishes when one turns to the Red Book predictions for the balance of payments. We already have a ballooning trade deficit of more than £1 million for every hour. The Red Book admits that that deficit will swell by half as much again. What is damning about the failure of the Budget to expand industry is that all that increase occurs in the manufacturing deficit. In 1993, the deficit in manufactured trade is expected to be as big as the deficit for the past two years added together—that is the measure of the Government's 14 years of failure.

I notice that no Conservative Member is rising to ask about the Labour Government's record on manufacturing trade, and I know why. It is because they know that, in every year under the last Labour Government, there was a surplus in manufacturing industry. That is the inheritance that the Conservatives have squandered.

Unlike the President of the Board of Trade, I do not believe in for ever talking down our inheritance. Britain has much to be proud of in its past. It should be proud of its inventions and the technology that it has given the world.

In the two centuries since the industrial revolution, Britain has repeatedly led the way. It led the way in railway technology. We had a surplus in the trade of railway vehicles until 1979, when it stood at £260 million. Under this Government, for the first time, we have a deficit in the trade of railway vehicles of £57 million. The pneumatic tyre was invented in Britain by John Dunlop, and we had a surplus in the trade in tyres until 1979, when it was £90 million. We now have a deficit of £38 million. The vacuum cleaner was invented in Britain and we had a surplus in the trade in vacuums until 1979, which has now, under the Government, been turned into a deficit.

[Mr. Cook]

I go some way to agreeing with the President and say that we should stop talking down Britain's proud past. We should start pinning the blame on the people who have pulled Britain down and turned our trade success into trade failure.

A fortnight ago, when the President was accusing me of talking down Britain, he produced as evidence of the recovery and the good things about Britain, which he said that I did not mention, the 400,000 small businesses that had started up and said:

"It is from the small and medium-sized company sector of the economy that jobs come".

The right hon. Gentleman was so proud of that figure that he repeated it again at Question Time last week.

The President is right to say that small and medium-sized enterprises are a vital source of innovation. He was also right in that, last year, 445,000 small businesses opened bank accounts for the first time. What the President did not tell the House was that, in the same year, 570,000 small businesses closed their bank accounts for the last time, and 125,000 more small businesses folded than started last year.

The right hon. Gentleman invited the House to congratulate the Government on their record in a year in which the number of small businesses that folded rose by 4 per cent. Is that the best that he can do in trying to talk up the Government's record—to admit that it is from the small and medium-sized company sector of the economy that jobs are disappearing?

Last Tuesday, Budget day, a bumper 110 of those small and medium-sized enterprises were advertised as going into liquidation, 19 of them in the manufacturing or engineering industry. They included MET Plastics in London, which were toolmakers and moulders. When asked why, the company said:

"Bad debts and the length of the recession".

HEE Equipment in Leeds made engineering machines, and when it was asked why it had folded, it said that it was because of bad debts. It was forced to make 100 people redundant. Hi-Spec Engineering in Nottingham made powered platforms and said that it had closed due to "The economic recession which resulted in an extended period of losses."

Action Work Force of Batley provided personnel to factories, and at one time employed 150 people in Batley. It failed because business in the factories "dried up".

When we rang up the companies, not one of them slammed down the phone accusing us of talking Britain down. Oddly enough, not one of those companies blamed the closures on the legacy of 1979 or mentioned how encouraged they were by the evidence of recovery around them. The President spent much time spotting that recovery. I understand that he is a noted bird fancier——

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Bird watcher.

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend—bird watching is not one of my sports. I understand that powerful binoculars are standard equipment in that sport. I warn the President that he should put aside those binoculars when he scans the economic indicators for signs of recovery that are not visible to the naked eye.

If the President wants to talk about recovery, I shall tell him what the Opposition understand by the word "recovery" and what they accept as its definition. Recovery will be achieved when unemployment falls to the 1·1 million figure that the Government inherited from us in 1979. When they obtain that figure, they can start to talk about improving the economy.

There is something much worse than talking Britain down—cheating. That is the next feature by which this Budget will be remembered—as an admission that the Government failed, and as an admission that they cheated.

The right hon. Member of Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) was the first Conservative to speak after the Budget speech. I have a great deal of regard for him; in the past, he and I have occasionally found ourselves on the same side of an argument. But on this occasion I was stunned to hear him say:

"I am happy to stand here, shamelessly, as a taxing Tory."
—[Official Report, Tuesday 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 202.]

"Shameless" is probably the correct word in that sentence, because I have looked at the right hon. Gentleman's election address for Shropshire, North. He did not stand there then as a shamelessly taxing Tory—quite the reverse. What he told the good people of Shropshire, North was:

"There is a strong need to be modest about election promises. They all have to be paid for with your money. As ever, I shall bear that strongly in mind."

What the right hon. Gentleman said in his constituency was the very opposite of coming here as a taxing Tory. I travelled up and down the country throughout the last general election, and I did not find a single taxing Tory anywhere in Britain at the time. The Tories fought the last election on the single proposition that they would cut taxes and Labour would put up taxes.

No one expressed this election strategy more succinctly than the President. In Corby on 21 March 1992, he said:

"This election in the first week is about tax. In the second week it is about tax. And in the third week it is about tax. And if Labour were to win this election the next five years would be nothing but tax."

This from a man who sits in a Cabinet that has presented us with the biggest tax increase of any Budget in history. The party that promised year-on-year tax cuts has become a Government delivering year-on-year tax rises.

Mr. John Townend: I note the hon. Gentleman's opposition to tax increases. He will know that I am not in favour of high taxes, but does he accept that we have a major problem with the Budget deficit? It can be dealt with, but spending will have to be cut, or taxes will have to go up—or a combination of these. What spending reductions does the hon. Gentleman want in place of the Government's tax increases?

Mr. Cook: What the Chancellor said at the general election was that he could foresee no circumstances in which he would have to extend VAT—but the hon. Gentleman may be ahead of the Chancellor. He may have been smarter and more far-seeing than the Chancellor. He may even have been more honest with his electors, so I invite him to point out to us the passage in his election address that mentioned that there was a severe problem with the public sector deficit and that it would be necessary to increase taxes when the Tories returned to office after the election. If he can do that, we will treat his intervention seriously——

Mr. Townend rose——

Mr. Cook: I look forward to hearing the passage in question.

Mr. Townend: I did make it quite clear in my election address that I believed in sound Government finance. [Laughter.]

Mr. Cook: I am sure that the good people of the hon. Gentleman's constituency read that on the assumption that they did not need to expect a swingeing tax increase from him—not even those numbered among the increase of 83 per cent. in unemployment in his constituency since the Prime Minister took office.

I seem to remember a poster from the election depicting a bombshell with, slapped on the side, the figure £35 billion. That was what the Government said Labour would put up taxes by. It was always a lie. The tax increases proposed by Labour at the last election added up to one tenth of that sum—but the posters were distributed around the constituencies.

If they went back to their committee rooms, perhaps Tory Members could find these posters lying around under chairs in back rooms. They might consider putting them up all around their constituencies again. All they need now slapped on the side of the bomb is the figure £28 billion, because that is the amount that the Government will take in extra tax if this Parliament runs another four years, even if the Chancellor never comes back and raises another penny in tax or extends the scope of VAT again or increases national insurance contibutions. That is the cost of Conservatism—£28 billion, or, as the Government prefer to express it, £1,000 for every household in the country.

This is such a blatant deceit that even The Sun is embarrassed. No one was more diligent about repeating the Tories' tax propaganda at the election; no one was more naive about swallowing their threats of what Labour would do than was the editor of The Sun. And, bless his trusting heart, Kelvin MacKenzie feels cheated now. Last week he offered his honest, forthright advice to the Treasury: go away and "lie down in a darkened room."

This was a Budget of failure and a Budget of cheats, but there is a third and final dimension that needs to be filled in if it is to be seen in the round. It is a budget of unjust men—unjust because they made the mistakes and they now expect everyone else to pay for them, not themselves. None of them will pay: everyone else will. They are unjust, too, because the tax increases that they have chosen will hit the poor hardest—such as the 500,000 people now being asked to pay more in national insurance even though they are too poor to be liable for income tax. These are the people who never saw any of the tax cuts of 1988. What right do the Government have to ask them to pay more when they all pay less in tax as a result of Budgets that they drafted?

If the Government had more courage, they would ask those with more income to make an extra sacrifice, but no such sacrifice is asked of them in the Budget. However, an extra sacrifice demanded of pensioners paying their fuel bills. They are the ones being asked to make the real sacrifices to put the nation's finances to rights. The President has a special responsibility in this matter; he is the Secretary of State for energy. I read in The Observer that he was furious at the attempt to put VAT on fuel, and I thought that entirely plausible, as he has a very large house to heat.

We learned today, however, that the right hon. Gentleman was not furious. In fact, he is furious at the suggestion that he was furious. So he agreed to it. The Government's energy spokesman agreed to slap 15 per cent. on energy bills. I hope that we have heard for the last time ever the right hon. Gentleman say that he cannot save the coal pits because that might put up electricity prices. British Coal has been bringing down the price of coal while the Government have been putting up the price of electricity.

There was plenty of time for this consultation. We know this because of the Chancellor's indiscretion on the "Jimmy Young Show". He explained to Jimmy Young that the origins of the new tax go back to last summer, to the Rio convention on global warming:

"The moment the convention was signed I was sitting at home thinking, 'What are we going to have to do?'"

[Laughter.] I am not kidding. Of course, it was a bogus claim. VAT is not being applied to fuel because the Chancellor has gone green. It is being applied because the Government's books have gone into the red.

How can we believe that the Government are serious about curbing greenhouse gases after the vindictive way in which they have run down public transport, and made savage cuts in the home insulation programme? How can we believe that the Chancellor is serious about energy conservation, given the housekeeping bills from his Department in the last financial year, during which the Treasury's bill rose by 14 per cent.? Not much energy conservation there. The fuel bill at the Inland Revenue rose by 21 per cent., and at the Customs and Excise—the department that will apply the VAT to pensioners' bills—last year's fuel bill rose by 68 per cent. And these are the people who are going to ask pensioners to turn down their heating.

I do not know whether the President was furious, but I can tell him that the nation is furious, because this measure will hit the poor hardest. Every study has shown that those at the bottom of the income ladder spend four times as much on fuel as a proportion of their income as do those at the top. For those at the bottom, their fuel bill is the biggest that they will get, and the Chancellor has just increased it by one sixth.

The President was gracious enough to remind the House that I was once a health spokesman. It is a marked feature of the British mortality statistics that they are the highest in Europe in winter. Our figures are worse than those of Sweden, Norway or Switzerland, but not because we have colder winters—indeed, their winters are colder than ours. We lose more old people in winter than any other country in Europe, because we pay the worst state pensions anywhere in Europe. We leave more pensioners asking themselves whether to pay for their eating or their heating.

We ask again the question that the Chancellor must answer before we vote at 10 o'clock: will pensioners and people on low incomes be fully compensated for the increases in their bills—not have them taken into account, but fully compensated?

The right hon. Gentleman will not get away with saying that the increases will be reflected in the payments to those on income support and means-tested benefits. There are 1·3 million pensioners living on incomes just as low as income support, but not getting a penny of it. Some of them, perhaps because of a mistaken sense of pride, will not ask for a means test. There are another 1 million pensioners living within 10 per cent. of the level of income support who will never qualify for a penny of it. Will they be compensated? We ask that because that is what they ask us.

At the weekend, I received a letter from a constituent on invalidity benefit, who therefore does not qualify for income support. He said:

"I am aghast and worried over the new proposed VAT on domestic fuels. At the moment I only put on my immersion heater for one and a half hours in the morning to heat the water and I have the gas heating on for an hour and a half in the morning and the same at lunchtime and in the evening. If I am too cold, I just make a hot water bottle and retire to bed since I must work within the limits of what I can afford to pay for my fuel bills."

Do Ministers have any idea what it is like for those who have to work within the limits of what they can afford to pay for fuel? Do they have any idea of the hardship that those people will now face, with the choice of going to bed even earlier or doing without another necessity?

Tonight, the House will have the opportunity to express its verdict on that proposal. We will vote against resolution No. 21 in order to record our contempt for a Budget of failures, of cheats and of injustices. We will do it to express our derision for the Treasury Bench of limpets clinging on to office after they have broken every promise that got them on to it. We will do it most of all to stop them making the poorest in society pay for their mistakes and their broken promises. It should not be the poor who pay: they should pay, and we will make it our job to ensure that they do.

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): A large part of the debate on the Budget has been concerned with undertakings which have not been fulfilled. Election addresses have been cited. Indeed, I read in one newspaper that Labour party headquarters is busy the whole day going through every election address by a Conservative candidate to find suitable quotations. I therefore want to get that matter out of the way immediately. I said in my election address:

"I opposed the Community Charge from the beginning because I believed it to be unfair, ill-planned, costly to administer and above all philosophically wrong and politically damaging. I was proved right. John Major, when he became Prime Minister, pledged himself to abolish it and has done so."

I then went on to deal with the fast rail link. I did not look to the future of taxes, in whatever form. That exempts me from an embarrassing position.

I believe that it is wrong for parties at a general election to give undertakings about taxation—either its rate or its nature. When I fought elections in the 1950s and the 1960s, that was not done. No Government or Chancellor's record justifies their being able to say with conviction that they can foresee the economic future for the following five years. It has never been proved that they can do so. All that declarations about rates of taxation can do is to mislead the electorate and lead to further embarrassments for Government, which then weakens our economic position internationally. I want a return to olden times. In fact, the practice was first broken in the 1959 election by Hugh Gaitskell, who promised to reduce taxes by 6d, which so shocked the electorate that he lost the election. I hope that we now have a period during which we do not give such undertakings.

When changes to indirect taxation are made by a Chancellor—changes which my right hon. Friend has justified—we know that that is bound to affect many people on social security benefits and those just above the limit for those benefits. The right thing for a Government to do is, at the same time as the charges are introduced, to say that they recognise the problem and that those people will be fully compensated for those increases. That is what Rab Butler did in the 1952 Budget, and it is what happened with Iain Macleod in 1970 and with Tony Barber in 1971. It shows that we understand the position of the millions of people who are affected by such changes. It gives them confidence that the Government of the day understand them and their problems, and it gives society as a whole confidence that we care about these matters and that we will take action to deal with them.

My third point relates to my party in particular because of the targets that it has set for direct taxation. They are not achievable targets. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will not say that, at some future time, we will reach the target of 20 per cent. and that the 40 per cent. rate will be reduced. There is no economic or moral justification for saying it. Although high taxes reduce efficiency and destroy a great deal of enterprise, we reach a point in the level of taxation where that is no longer the case. That is evident from the level of taxes paid by other countries with very successful economies, such as Germany and Japan, whose tax levels are higher than ours and higher than our targets.

When told bluntly what is required from them, the British people will respond. It is not necessary to try to smooth the path. I accept that the path in front of us is very difficult, and I have every sympathy with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Government in the problems that they face. The economic position, with high unemployment and the destruction of so much of our industrial base, means that it will take many years to deal with the problems. There can be no easy, quick solution. If that is brought home to the British people, they will support the necessary steps—one of which is that the wealthier people should be prepared to pay a higher rate of tax. I believe that they would respond to a demand that they do so.

One thing that we desperately need in this country is a better superstructure. It is right to say that we have been spending more on that, but it does not meet the demands that our superstructure now makes.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): I think that my right hon. Friend means infrastructure.

Sir Edward Heath: Yes, I mean infrastructure. So many countries in Europe, North America and the far east have infrastructures infinitely superior to Britain's.

We have only to look at London and the development needed there. There is no effective overall body to deal with that. Ours is the only major capital city in the world which does not have one. The former central body, the Greater London council, was abolished out of spite because of a handful of miserable Labour councils. Now we do not have that authority. To cite one specific example, when one drives out of London on the M4, as I frequently do, one must use a double-lane highway. In recent years, high buildings have been erected right alongside that road, so that if ever we have a Government who recognise that the M4, which was built 40 years ago, is totally inadequate for modern requirements, various new buildings will have to be pulled down to enable the construction of a new highway. That shows no sense of responsibility towards the demands of a very modern society. That is another case which desires urgent action. After all, improving the infrastructure provides jobs for many people.

As to the contraction of our industrial base over the past 12 years, we lost part of it at the beginning of the 1980s because we were so determined to push up the rate of sterling. Firms in my own constituency which has been established for 100 or 150 years went out of business. They never came back and they never will. That is happening in the present situation, with a further loss of our industrial base. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade rightly said that we must encourage industry, and he is doing so. Many of the measures in the Budget are extremely useful and make a great deal of sense. I am glad that they are being adopted by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the President of the Board of Trade.

In the mid-1980s, small firms went into business with a rush, and we know from the figures that they are in immense difficulty now. The kind of people who start small firms now have learnt the lesson of the 1980s and will not take the same risks. They will not allow themselves to get into that position. They also see how this country's banks behave when small firms get into difficulty. There is no relationship between the banks and industry in this country as there is in Germany and France, and that is what is lacking.

That apart, the major banks have enormous problems as a consequence of unwise investments, debts, loans and property purchases over the past decade. One must keep one's tongue in one's cheek when talking about London being the greatest financial centre in Europe or in the world; people outside know what is happening and can see the problems which have arisen in our banking system in the last 10 years.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade mentioned Rolls-Royce. I will add to his remarks, especially as I know the attitude of so many of my hon. Friends on the Benches behind me. We took over Rolls-Royce in 1970 because it was bankrupt and its directors were trading against company law. We took over the company to save it from being prosecuted for tens of millions or hundreds of millions of pounds, but we were careful to do so in terms of a private company so that it could be privatised. That was exactly our plan.

That was not done without an attempt to persuade the private sector to look after Rolls-Royce. When a leading accountant reported to me that the company was not only heavily in debt but under contract to the Americans to produce an engine, would not make the delivery date, and would therefore be liable to a penalty of £400 million—a large amount of money in those days—I invited the chairmen of the four banks concerned to meet me in the Cabinet room. I explained the situation and said, "I hope that you feel that you can support industry in this country." All four flatly refused to help in any way at all. One chairman whose bank had offered a loan of £25 million, of which only £21 million had been taken up, promptly dashed back to his office and cancelled the remaining £4 million.

If we had not taken the action we did, all the military planes with Rolls-Royce engines would have been unable to obtain spares and would have gone out of action. The same would have been true of all civil aircraft with Rolls-Royce engines. It would have been grossly irresponsible for any British Government to fail to stand

That company could have been privatised much earlier, but the management badly miscalculated what would happen to the dollar in the early 1980s, so privatisation had to be postponed. The company was subsequently privatised, and it is now successful, but it would not have remained in existence if the Government had failed to take action. There are instances when a Government is justified in taking action; I hope that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will always bear that in mind.

My right hon. Friend also mentioned delegations to various countries in support of British industry. I would take it a stage further. British Industry requires much more support from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and from our embassies and consulates abroad. I do not in any way blame the Foreign Office—the three years that I spent there as Lord Privy Seal were among the happiest of my life. For a decade, the Foreign Office has been maligned and accused of every possible crime—of always selling out to the foreigner—and its staff has been drastically reduced. It needs its confidence restored and to be provided with an adequate level of staff. That means money from the Treasury. It is not good enough for the Treasury to say, "Where shall we slash? We'll make it the Foreign Office."

The Japanese, for example, have a full consulate in every major city in the People's Republic of China. Britain has only one—in Shanghai—in addition to our embassy in Peking. The British consulate in Shanghai has a staff of seven—the consul-general, deputy, and press officer, and four assistants. Two of the four assistants are the wives of other consulate members. The Japanese have 410 in Shanghai. I am not urging that level, but we must face the challenge from other countries looking after their industries.

Foreign policy should be directed at British interests, industry and finance. We are losing masses of trade in the middle east. That is true also of Iran, because of our relationships over that wretched book. If one writes a book and it offends, one can be protected in one's own country. I thought that the author in question was wealthy enough to protect himself, but we provide public protection—very well, but I see no reason why we should ruin our relationship with Iran, which can be a very profitable market.

We are responsible for the United Nations resolution on trade with Iraq. Unfortunately, it affects companies which traded before Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait and war broke out. Those companies cannot obtain payment for trade before the war. That cannot be justified. Other countries have already made arrangements with Iraq for the time when sanctions are removed. They will get all the business, because of our foreign policy. The same applies to Libya, where there is massive trade to be done. We are not touching it, because we are standing by the Americans.

All that may sound like heresy to some people, but we must look after our interests through our foreign policy. If I am mistaken in any of my remarks, I am perfectly ready to stand corrected, but the fact remains that foreign policy must take into account our trading and industrial interests. Much as one welcomes a delegation led by a Minister, it honestly does not have a big effect.

The problem goes much deeper than anything that I have mentioned or that I have heard mentioned. I refer to the nature of our society in this country. That has been a problem for many years. Industry is still not recognised as a prime factor in our society. Do all the best and brightest in our universities say, "I must get into industry"? No; they want to get into the City, if they can—into some bank, preferably a private bank—or into public relations. The last thing they want is to work in industry. Nor am I certain that industry would welcome them; I am afraid that it does not always do so. Why is that? It is because comparatively few are management-trained at the top. Few have been to a top business school.

I recall only too well my visit to INSEAD at Versailles to present prizes. I asked the British contingent which firms they were going back to; only one person was returning to this country, and he was with one of the oil companies. He said, "The company paid for me to come here, and I feel that I am under an obligation to go back. I do not mind, because the company told me that if I was successful I would receive an increase in pay." When I asked the others where they were going, they replied, "There is no point in going back: they do not want us, and they are not prepared to pay us." They said that they would go and work for American, French or German firms.

That is the nature of our society. Despite all the changes of recent years—so many that we cannot even keep up to date with them—we have no satisfactory education system; we have not the major educational, scientific and technical system that the Germans have had since the last quarter of the last century. Moreover, we are not trying to secure such a system; we are not concentrating on that at all. Management feel that it would be rather a bore to employ people who have experienced a form of education that those currently at the top have never had, because there is just a chance that such people will know more than they do.

I emphasise that all the measures in the Budget are desirable, apart from one about which I am not quite sure —the measure relating to self-assessment for tax purposes. A number of my constituents come to me and say, "Look at what the Inland Revenue has said about our accountants' report—can you arrange for some action to be taken?" Heaven knows how many cases there will be in the event of self-assessment, but I will let that pass. I am concerned with the nature of our society; that is what we must aim to change if we are to make up the loss of our industrial base and secure a top management who can return us to a reasonable position in the world economy.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): In his powerful speech, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) made a plea for manufacturing industry, with which I shall deal at some length. He made another important point, however: he said that there were greater priorities than a 20 per cent. tax rate, and asked for a larger contribution from those who pay the highest rate. A sad aspect of the debate is that we are unlikely to hear many echoes of that request; that is a great shame.

In the past two years, the Thatcherite adventure has ended. Those 11 long years of folly started with the belief that the philosopher's stone of monetarism had been discovered, and reached the high point of hallucination —the hallucination that we were in the midst of an economic miracle. In fact, as we know, we were living on fool's gold. That is why we squandered £120 billion of North sea oil money, and £40 billion or more of privatisation receipts. Instead of using those enormous and wholly exceptional moneys to recreate our industry and restructure our essential services, we spent them on importing foreign luxuries, thereby ruining our own manufacturers.

Personally, I can never forgive the Government for reducing the number of firms in my constituency by 30 per cent.—manufacturing firms, in the main; firms that provided the goods and services that we see in every country. The closing of some of those firms lowered what had been higher-than-average levels of employment and pay in the constituency.

That period has now come to an end—notably in the Budget—with a suddenness that surprised only those who believed the Thatcherite nonsense that they so readily proclaimed. It was never a free lunch, and now the bill must be paid. The measure of that bill—in just this one year—is a £17·5 billion balance of payments deficit, and a £50 billion public sector borrowing requirement.

How then do the Government intend to restore our finances, both internal and external? That is the critical question. There are no further increases in North sea oil to provide the necessary income; what the North sea is producing we are already spending. There will be few further receipts from privatisation: the barrel has been fairly well scraped. Indeed, whereas in the past the Government could rely on £5 billion a year—and spent it —they will suffer a fall in privatisation receipts from now on.

The position is worsening all the time, which is one reason why the Government are so adamant in opposing the social chapter. They depend on a Britain with cheap labour and weak trade unions, attracting investment on the basis that it is a part of the European Community with certain unique advantages which they wish to advertise. The existence of cheap and docile labour is the Government's solution to the economic problems that they have inflicted on us. The social chapter runs directly counter to that vision; they will therefore fight fiercely to prevent its enactment. That is their solution to the Thatcher years.

The Chancellor has repeatedly said how much assistance he is giving manufacturing industry, and the President of the Board of Trade said today that the Budget was one more step in the strategy for industry. I wish that I had observed any such steps. Undoubtedly, the right hon. Gentleman has been a great disappointment. There were those who strongly disagreed with much of his politics, but, when he said that he would intervene in industry at various times of the day, we thought that he would at least make some sort of effort: we expected something from a person of such energy and drive.

The Budget has given some assistance here and there, but it provides little for manufacturing industry. The £900 million for advance corporation tax relief, the £400 million for petroleum revenue tax abolition and a few other concessions may help some firms, but they do not matter much to the one industry that really counts in the long term—manufacturing industry.

Let me say in passing that I welcome the easing of certain VAT penalties. The Inland Revenue operates on the basis of an understanding of the real world, whereas VAT is the direct descendant of excise duties that resulted from the fact that, over the centuries, the establishment of a harsh regime was the only way in which to protect revenue. The system of VAT collection did not allow sufficiently for an understanding approach to genuine error.

I often feel that the greatest help that Government can give small businesses is to avoid adding to their burdens. Many small businesses would forgo any Government assistance if they could only be left alone. I know that, in this hard world, that cannot happen; but any help given by Government must be set alongside such a natural aspiration. Governments always require certain information to ensure that financial assistance is properly accountable; I understand that.

In a small firm, however, frequently only one person can provide such information—the person who is engaged in running the business, and who is diverted from the essential operation of the company. That person is even more diverted when there are substantial penalties for not carrying out the tasks required by Government. I therefore welcome the easing of the VAT penalties.

Let me turn to the next Budget that this Chancellor will present. The Chancellor has told the country that he does not wish to harm recovery by introducing large tax increases now; in the main, such increases will come later. Last week's Budget, however, is the first shoe to drop; while waiting for the second, people will be reluctant to spend. They know that the second shoe will soon follow, and their expectations will take account of that. The Government have shown us an unusual vista—the prospect not of jam tomorrow, but of vinegar for some years to come. This was a Government, however, who believed at one time in "rational expectations". Nigel Lawson believed that, by controlling the money supply, employers and trade unions would see that sterling M3 was coming down and would reduce pay claims on the basis of such "rational expectations".

Of course, employers and trade unions did no such thing. It is amusing—though sad—to recount the folly of those times. Rational expectations, however, can work only if people actually believe that things are going to happen. If they truly believe that taxation will affect them in the way that the Government have stated, spending will be curtailed, not just next year and the year after but this year as well. The only way that that will not happen is if people do not believe the Government. There may be something in that view. The Government have already back-tracked on compensation for VAT on fuel for certain groups of people. Who knows what further U-turns might lie ahead? This is, after all, a very weak Government. Many policy changes are possible.

There is a further factor that may change the income/expenditure picture to be painted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the autumn: that, while expenditure has to be fixed two or three years ahead, because of the planning required, revenue can be determined within a few weeks of the announcement. One does not have to make revenue plans anything like as far ahead as one has to make expenditure plans. We can be pretty sure how much the Government expect to spend in 1994 and 1995, but how much they will raise in revenue is still an open question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement, although said to be definite, is still only an opening shot.

I particularly regretted, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) in his outstanding speech, the increase in VAT on fuel and power. In 1976, when we held the presidency of the Community, I negotiated the maintenance of our zero rating. That was always under attack by our Community partners, It was defensible, on the basis that it was the most important way of limiting the regressiveness of the tax. Without zero rating, VAT becomes a tax on the least well-off in our society. That remains true today. Those above income support levels, particularly the elderly, already find their gas and electricity bills a special burden. They spent most of their time indoors and have special needs for cooking and heating. They will be very unfairly hit by this tax.

For those who believe in a progressive system of taxation, the excessive reduction in the high rates of tax, the emasculation of capital transfer tax and now the abolition of VAT zero rating on fuel means, in effect, a transfer from a progressive system of taxation to a regressive system. Whatever other policy decisions my hon. Friends will decide upon, the return to more progressive systems of taxation must be an essential part of them.

What I found most depressing in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the absence of any real help, which I believe that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) wishes to see, for manufacturing industry. The many limited measures set out to assist here were not satisfying. They seemed to be designed to placate the sufferers rather than to provide real solutions to real problems. The real problems are investment in our manufacturing industry and the restoration of the broader base, which has been allowed to shrink.

Manufacturing industry alone can provide the goods and the exports that produce the wealth which enable more people to be employed in the service industries. I accept that we cannot assume that there will be a large increase in the number of jobs in manufacturing industry. As manufacturing becomes more efficient and finds more methods of automation—an idea that was prevalent 20 years ago—it is bound to shrink in size. However, manufacturing industry will produce more, and the selling of those goods will provide the wealth to enable us to have the service industries, the infrastructure developments and the various requirements that we expect of our social services.

In the midst of all these problems, we have heard that low inflation and low direct taxation are the priorities, but if we are to have a priority among priorities, it must be our manufacturing industry. That is the fount of our prosperity. If we achieve success there, the balance of payments will improve and more money will be available for infrastructure development and the public services that I mentioned.

Prosperity cannot come from trying to spend our way out of recession. That will lead to yet more imports. The weekly assessment of any rise in retail expenditure is looked upon as a sign that recovery is coming. Those with longer memories of our recent economic experience will remember that such expenditure does not solve our problems. It is not consumption that will lead us out of recession. There was a case, of some sort, for that argument when we produced most of the goods that found their way into our shops. Today, so many of the goods we made we now import. Therefore, a rise in consumption is more likely to lead to greater imports and to a worsening of our trade deficit.

The only long-term way out of recession is by investment, particularly in the production process, and by a level of the pound that stimulates exports and weakens our partiality to import. I still believe that there is room for the pound to go down, if we are serious about acting upon imports and encouraging exports.

We need to limit the tendency to import, and that means a competitive pound. The voices of the City and the Bank of England, which would dearly like to emulate the power and independence of the Bundesbank, must be resisted. The lack of political influence of our manufacturing industry has always been one of the serious weaknesses of our economy. In any conflict between the needs of industry and the voice of the City, there is only one winner. As Winston Churchill said:

"Finance should be less proud and industry more content."

It is an unequal contest. It arises from our centre of finance being a mile or so down the road and the centre of gravity of our industry being a hundred or more miles up the M1, the M6 and the M4.

Industry and the country require a competitive pound. If that means allowing the pound to decline still further, that will need to be accepted. We should not be in a hurry to return to the exchange rate mechanism, although I should prefer not only a competitive but a stable pound. There are great inefficiencies in foreign trade when the price of the goods purchased and sold cannot be precisely known. It is not sufficient that the forward foreign exchange currency market provides ample opportunities for hedging. The fact is that international trade is conducted on a basis more akin to the home market, with orders being delayed, deferred and cancelled with frequency.

Few overseas orders nowadays are on a letter of credit basis, where the date of delivery is tightly specified. In those conditions, such forward currency precautions used to be a controlled way of limiting currency risks. In the present currency see-saw, the foreign exchange losses can be greater than the profit on a transaction. Therefore, it is far better to have a stable exchange rate that can be adjusted from time to time. In the past few weeks, we have seen variations of up to 5 per cent. in the pound's value against major currencies. Adjustments made as required need not be more, would happen infrequently and would result in the fine pricing of contracts, with advantage to international trade.

What I had hoped to see was a Budget for industry. In 1991, we had a Budget that was supposed to be good for business. In 1992, we had a Budget that was supposed to be good for recovery. This year, we had a Budget for sustained recovery. What we needed was a Budget for industry. We did not get one. Therefore, the basic problems that face our country are no nearer solution.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): I suppose that this is positively my last appearance in a spring Budget debate. One of the pleasures over the years in these debates has been to follow the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon).

I intend to say a few words about the Government's proposals to change the time of the debate from the spring to the late autumn. It raises a number of difficult questions. The Government have published a White Paper on the issue. It referred to a number of Treasury Select Committee reports that were prepared under my chairmanship but, strangely, not a report, also under my chairmanship, that was prepared by the Select Committee on Procedure (Finance).

Trying to deal with public expenditure and taxation provisions at the same time will place a heavy burden on Treasury Ministers. Therefore, I commend to the Chancellor and his Treasury colleagues the Select Committee's suggestion that there is a strong case in future for dividing measures on taxation into three parts.

The first would be a Bill dealing essentially with economic management and, therefore, primarily with changes in tax rates. The second would be a taxes management Bill which could be introduced at any time during the year. The third, if a new tax were introduced, would be the procedure that we adopted when we introduced value added tax—a Green Paper, draft clauses and so on. Unless such changes are made, the burden on the Treasury and on the House of dealing simultaneously with public expenditure and taxation will be a real problem.

Following on from that, there is a danger that the House's opportunities to debate such matters will be significantly diminished. Until recently, we held debates on the autumn statement, on the public expenditure White Paper and on the Budget. If we debate the Budget only in the autumn, the opportunities for serious debate in the House, related to a specific proposal announced by the Treasury, will be reduced to one. We should not contemplate that, because it is important that the House should have the opportunity to debate these vital matters during the year.

I deal now with what has become the political, if not the economic, centre of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's proposals—the proposals to levy VAT on domestic fuel and power at a rate of 8 per cent. from next April and of 17·5 per cent. from the following April. It is rather curious that, although the date of the Budget is to change from spring to late autumn, the proposals for changing the rate of VAT will still come into effect in April. It is rather like the smile on the Cheshire cat's face remaining after the Cheshire cat has disappeared.

When Iain Macleod and I, together with Professor Wheatcroft and Arthur Cockfield, devised the VAT system that we now have, we spent a great deal of time examining the experience of the countries of the Common Market, as it then was. We came to two clear conclusions. The first was that there should be only a single rate of positive VAT. The second was that there should be relief by way of zero rating for those at the bottom of the income scale. In that sense, the tax that we devised was superior to others in the Common Market.

At the same time, of course, we abolished the selective employment tax and the multi-rate purchase tax. The change from the SET and a purchase tax to VAT was not regressive because of zero rating. We got rid of a system of variable rates, or multi-rates, which had meant that the pattern of consumer expenditure was being distorted. Those two essential Conservative principles were important changes and meant that we introduced a better tax than those that we found in the European Community.

Having said that, I clearly view with considerable misgivings my right hon. Friend's proposal for imposing a positive rate of VAT on fuel and power consumed domestically. I believe strongly that it is a mistake to change the structure of taxation for short-term or tactical revenue-raising reasons, which is what we are in danger of doing now, or, to put it more accurately, next year.

The change is not likely to be reversible. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne intervened on my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on the second day of our Budget debate. The Chief Secretary replied:

"The proper argument against Community intervention in our zero rates is the right of the House to determine our taxation rates. It is the right of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor . . . to decide what they should be."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 302.]

However, we know what enormous pressure there has been on this country to harmonise our system of taxation and bring it in line with that elsewhere in the Community. If we abandon zero rates on fuel and power, it will not be possible to reinstate them at a later date.

Another worrying aspect is that the more one erodes the scope of zero rating, the greater the pressure from the European Community will become to remove it altogether, not only from fuel and power and newspapers but from food and other essential items. I am reminded of a remark made by my permanent secretary when we introduced VAT. The question of harmonisation arose, and he said, "If the Italians collect it, we'll harmonise it." There was something in that. We are increasingly under pressure to harmonise our VAT rate with a European form of that tax, which is less satisfactory than that which we originally devised. Therefore, the current proposal is an unfortunate development.

I am rather worried about the proposal to increase VAT on fuel and power to 17·5 per cent. in stages and the imposition of an 8 per cent. tax next year. That raises the issue of multiple rates which I have always believed that we, as Conservatives, did not favour. Once people have paid their direct tax, we should not use the tax system to distort the pattern of consumer expenditure.

I now come to the difficult question——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend says that we should not use the tax system to distort consumer expenditure. What about the differentiation between leaded and unleaded petrol, which is an environmental factor? One could say that the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel and power is also an environmental tax because it has followed on from the Earth summit and we must reduce fuel consumption.

Sir Terence Higgins: I was about to deal with that point, and I hope to be able to satisfy my hon. Friend in that respect.

I am bound to say that there has been a certain amount of confusion about the controversial question of compensation and precisely what the Government have in mind. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will manage to clear it up when he winds up the debate this evening. There has been much talk, especially from members of the Opposition Front Bench, about compensation in full for the imposition of VAT on fuel and power. I saw the shadow Chancellor on "Question Time" the other night, saying that the Chancellor would be increasing the cost of fuel by 17·5 per cent. That is, of course, an economically illiterate view. It would be valid only if the elasticity of demand for fuel and power were zero. It is always the case that when an indirect tax is imposed, even at the final stage, a certain amount of the tax is absorbed by the person supplying the goods or services. Therefore, the idea of full compensation——

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Not in the case of a monopoly.

Sir Terence Higgins: Whether or not there is a monopoly. The idea of full compensation is, to say the least, difficult to define. In political terms, however much one compensates for the change, people will continue to say that it has not been enough. By way of an example, I cite the fact that we were unable to remove VAT from charities. When we introduced VAT originally, we introduced at the same time a number of proposals to give increased benefits to charities by way of covenants, and so on.

On two, if not three, subsequent occasions, further concessions have been made to charities to compensate for the fact that we have not managed to exclude them completely from the scope of VAT. I have not the slightest doubt that the total of those concessions is vastly in excess of the burden of VAT on charities, but charities will continue to say that they need to be compensated. I fear that the same will happen in this case: if we impose VAT on fuel and power, however much we compensate people, the political reality will be that we shall still be blamed. Overall, I have considerable doubts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) said that the tax was helpful for green issues and she referred to the Rio summit. We had a one-line Whip on the second day of the Budget debate and, curiously enough, I was invited to hear a speech at the Royal Geographical Society that evening given by Mr. Robert Swan, who is the United Nations roving ambassador on the environment. Rather more exceptionally, he is the only person to have gone on foot to both the north and south poles. He was desperately concerned about the effects on the ozone layer of global warming. I was impressed by his arguments which he put forward with immense expertise and passion.

The other side to the coin, therefore, is that there is a strong argument on environmental grounds for imposing a tax on fuel and power. However, I am bound to say that the impact is estimated to be 1·5 million tonnes, which is only a small part of the likely decrease that will be needed between now and the deadline of the end of the century, by which time there should have been a reduction of about 10 million tonnes. A big change will be required.

The vital point this year was that the Chancellor should do nothing to damage the present fragile recovery. I am glad that, by and large, the changes he has proposed for this year are broadly neutral. The Budget is not entirely neutral because there will be some increase in taxation. None the less, the Budget will not seriously damage the recovery that we all wish to see.

[Sir Terence Higgins]

I have more serious doubts about the idea of saying that, as we must take account of the future deficit, we must legislate now for what happens next year and the year after, to reassure the City. Our record on forecasts is not so good that we can say that we shall legislate now for what happens in two years' time. I believe that one thing is sure. We do not know how much of our present fiscal deficit is structural and how much of it is cyclical. That is clearly recognised in the Red Book, which makes that point.

We must remember that it was not long ago that we were in budget surplus. That might lead us to suggest that most of the deficit is cyclical. In any event, we need to wait for the recovery to go rather further before we can decide how much is structural and how much is cyclical. to anticipate what will happen and to say that we propose to legislate now for what will happen next year and the year after puts too great a weight on our expectations of what is likely to happen to the fiscal deficit.

We must, of course, take account of the views of the financial markets which are worried about the size of the public sector borrowing requirement. My guess is that the Chancellor and the Treasury have overestimated the likely size of the fiscal deficit next year or the year after. I suspect that the deficit will not be as great as they suppose. That being so, there was a case for waiting until we saw rather more clearly how the economy was developing before proposing increases in taxation such as are suggested in the Budget. We can debate those matters during the proceedings on the Finance Bill and it is important that we should begin to approach the question analytically.

My fundamental feeling is that it is right that the Chancellor has taken no action that will affect the recovery this year. With the successive cuts in interest rates and the significant depreciation in sterling, recovery is likely to come faster than we expect. One point that can always be made about the economy is that one always underestimates turning points, whether from up to down or from down to up. The underestimate of the importance of the turning point has increased over all the cycles. That being so, I believe that we shall see recovery, probably faster than we believe likely, and with a faster decline in the deficit than is supposed. I have considerable doubts, therefore, about anticipating what is likely to happen next year and the year after.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins). I was interested in two points. He said that the Chancellor had done nothing to damage the prospects for recovery, which was one of the stated aims of the Budget. Why, then, did the Chancellor find it necessary to announce in advance—for the first time, in my experience in the House—imposts of taxation in future years? It would have been perfectly reasonable for him to say that he reserved the right to increase taxes "as and when". That would have been an unexceptional position. By making the announcement in advance, he may have damaged the process of recovery. People are not daft—they can see next year coming and they may begin to take evasive action, especially in relation to the increased costs for fuel and domestic heating. I do not believe that the Chancellor can say that he has done nothing to damage the interests of and the prospects for recovery.

The right hon. Member for Worthing is an eminent figure and his voice is listened to carefully by the Government—as it should be—but he did not carry the House with him when he tried to justify the increases in value added tax on heating and on domestic fuel. He said that such matters were difficult and that there would always be political blame. By taking that line, the right hon. Gentleman is encouraging his right hon. Friend the Chancellor to consider other matters in relation to VAT.

The Government's stated position is that by the end of this Parliament they want to have a 20p rate of income tax. The only conceivable way in which they can do that, against the dire financial position in the past and in the future, is by increasing VAT, not only on newspapers and on sewerage, but on food, on new-build costs, on magazines and on children's clothes. That would be unconscienable. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. Member for Worthing will be careful about how he argues the justification for the changes made.

This has been an interesting debate, apart from the purple passages in which the President of the Board of Trade went native, as he always does. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) made a powerful speech which was witty and well argued. The one point that he established beyond all peradventure was that the Budget is regressive. The House should be concerned about that.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) also made a powerful speech. I agree that we need urgently to assist exporters. We need to try to get a more industrial, scientific and technological ethic into our education process. I agree that, most importantly, the precedent for not making promises about taxation in political manifestos at elections should be considered carefully and that we should try to eschew such promises in future. Such promises serve no useful purpose. It does nobody any good to try to get political parties to anticipate financial and economic positions that they cannot foresee, and it does the political process no good to try to do so.

The Chancellor would have had slightly more credibility if he had admitted candidly that although he would not increase income tax, he would increase taxes on income. That is a reasonable action to take when facing deficits which are getting out of control. However, as the hon. Member for Livingston said, the Chancellor did not have to do that through regressive means or to make the poor pay most.

When the Chancellor set out his strategy, he said that he wanted to take no risks with recovery. He rightly said, too, that he had to cope with a burgeoning budget deficit. The economic difficulites that he faces are immense. The tax base has been eroded, and there is a long-term pattern of increase in public expenditure. Given that that is the case, certain things need to be done as a matter of urgency. As regards the balance of trade, the country is running an unsustainable deficit—and, what is worse, has been doing so during a recession. We cannot possibly expect to get away with an ever-deteriorating trade balance. In short, the economy is in a mess.

The right hon. Member for Worthing wondered whether the problem was cyclical rather than structural. I think that the evidence is against him, although I accept that it may be too early to say. In my view, the damage and the difficulties are structural rather than cyclical. As I said, history may prove me wrong. In any case, it is important to get the answer to that question right.

It is the height of irony that the principal stimulus that the Chancellor said would be the engine of recovery should have originated from a policy that the Government strove, until last autumn, to avoid—namely, devaluation and interest rate reductions. No one has yet asked what is happening to the exchange rate mechanism in all this. Is that question in Ministers' minds? I should be interested to know what will happen in the near future.

The growth forecasts in the Red Book are an awful lot more realistic than they have been in the past. I am staggered, however, to find that the forecasts for export volumes for 1994 are shown at 10 per cent. I am even more staggered to discover that the forecasts for import volumes for 1994 are shown at 9 per cent. Those are extraordinary figures. Frankly, I do not believe that it is possible to achieve such export and import figures in the period to which we are referring. Much of the Budget strategy is based on export-led growth. If the 10 per cent. growth in export volume is not achieved by 1994, all the Government's calculations may prove to have been built on sand. I do not think that the exchange rate is competitive enough to sustain export growth at the levels to which the Red Book refers. I certainly do not think that the European markets that we face at present are buoyant enough to enable us to achieve such targets. The level of market-led growth is therefore highly doubtful.

What of the increase in national insurance contributions? I was interested to discover that the Chancellor had chosen that device. The longer I serve in this place, the more convinced I become that national insurance contributions should be abolished. As I said earlier, the way in which the Chancellor has chosen to introduce revenue-raising tax measures is extremely regressive, but it is both particularly bad and silly to have chosen national insurance contributions as a vehicle.

National insurance contributions are anachronistic and anomalous and there is a strong case for sweeping them away and replacing them with a unified tax system. That would simplify matters and save a lot in administrative costs. We could then move, over a period, to an integrated system of tax and benefit—a partial basic income scheme of the kind that people have been discussing for some years. It would take time and effort, but it would be worth considering carefully the possibility of moving in that direction.

Let me say something about Budget secrecy. The right hon. Member for Worthing has played a valuable role in persuading the Government to make progressive changes in the way in which the Budget is introduced. The departmental White Papers are better than they used to be and although a unified Budget in November and December may cause problems for the Treasury, because it will involve revenue and expenditure being dealt with at the same time, the changes have been well worth while. But we are still left with this ludicrous Budget purdah, which causes all sorts of difficulties. The Government experienced some of them this year.

Other Government Departments need to know what is in the Chancellor's mind. The President of the Board of Trade had the confession dragged out of him that he was told about the proposed change in VAT on domestic fuel. If that is true, that is fine, but how much better it would be if all the Departments—the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of Social Security, for example—were notified. The campaign to increase council house sales that the Department of the Environment is pursuing may have been significantly affected by the mortgage interest tax relief change in the Budget. Departments are interrelated as regards such matters.

How much better it would be to abolish Budget purdah and secrecy and have a draft Budget, or at least a White Paper outlining the options under consideration by the Chancellor, in the lead-up to the Budget. That would make for a better informed public debate and we should be able to sort out numerous difficulties. Lord Lawson experienced tremendous difficulties when he made changes in mortgage interest tax relief for people who were not married but living together. Such difficulties could be avoided if there were more openness.

Much of the technical dross which took up two hours of the Chancellor's Budget statement could also be avoided. The technical stuff could be dealt with outside the ambit of the Chancellor's strategic statement. We must address that problem as a matter of urgency. People from outside this country think that the way in which we conduct the Budget—with Ministers going into purdah, saying nothing to anyone and having to report to the Chancellor all meetings with financial journalists—is daft and makes no sense in a modern democracy.

What impact will the Budget have on the poor? The other day I heard the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security say that the increase in the 20p income tax band would help the poor. She was talking about increases in heating costs. The change does nothing of the sort. The only way in which we can get increased help to the poor —always supposing that that was what the Chancellor was seeking to do—is to increase personal allowances. The Chancellor did not do that; he froze them, which made the impact of the fiscal changes on the poor worse.

I wonder whether the Secretary of State for Social Security knew about the changes in VAT on heating and fuel. If he did, he should have ensured that the Government's plans for compensation were well thought out in advance so as to avoid the confusion which followed the Budget statement. If he knew, but took no steps to clarify matters from day one, he bears a heavy burden of responsibility because he has caused great concern throughout the country. I still do not understand what the Government have in mind. Newspaper journalists cannot be blamed for engaging in speculation and stories which get more exaggerated every time they go along the rumour chain. It is unconscionable to inflict such concern on people who stand to be deeply affected by such changes.

The Treasury had better look at the consequences outlined in the Scottish Economic Bulletin of February 1993. The Institute of Fiscal Studies conducted a study on the distributional aspects of environmental taxation. It ran a model, putting the 17·5 per cent. increase into fuel and petrol costs and running a test across England and Wales on the one hand and Scotland on the other. The conclusion is absolutely clear:

> "Using a tax rate of 17·5 per cent., the additional tax payments amount to some 2 per cent. of total expenditure amongst households in the poorest 20 per cent. of the income distribution, but only around 0·6 per cent. for households in the richest 20 per cent."

That is what we have been saying for the past several days: the measure will have a much more marked impact on the poor. The Institute of Fiscal Studies is a perfectly respectable and professional body of researchers. In February 1993, it showed that because of household types and access to different kinds of energy—particularly the lack of gas—there would be a widely disproportionate effect in Scotland. That is the kind of information that the Government should consider before gaily taking decisions to increase energy costs.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The hon. Gentleman is referring to the difference between Scotland and England. Has he considered the difference between urban areas and rural areas? Most rural areas have little, if any, public transport. They are also more exposed to the elements. Households in such areas therefore require more heating.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is absolutely right and that point has been made very clear. I commend the IFS report to the Treasury Front Bench as it would repay careful study.

I have probably been speaking for too long, but I want to make a final point. The Government were elected in 1979. If someone had told me then that I was going to be in Government until 1996, with a working parliamentary majority, access to windfall resources from £100,000 million worth of North sea oil and gas and windfall revenue from £60,000 million of privatisation proceeds, but that I would end up with a public sector deficit of £30 billion, high unemployment and public expenditure running at 44 per cent. of gross national product, I would have considered that to be an absolutely appalling record. The Government forfeit any right to claim that they have a scintilla of economic competence.

If the question is, "Have the Government got a grip on the economic situation in this country?" the answer must certainly be no.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Before I call the right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), I remind right hon. and hon. Members that Madam Speaker has imposed the 10-minute rule from 7pm to 9pm.

7.1 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will forgive me if I do not mention the favourable parts of the Budget, on which I would otherwise have dwelt extensively. In particular, I applaud the measures to help small businesses. They were admirable and very well thought out.

I expect that the Budget will be judged—as it should be—by its overall effect on the economy. This is the first Budget that I can recall in which reducing the deficit has been postponed deliberately. I understand that the Government certainly do not want to trample on the recovery which is now under way. At the same time, as has been said, the Government must satisfy the City that enough is being done within the medium-term financial strategy to ensure that the deficit is dealt with.

However, I believe that that is a peculiar judgment. It is also strange that the seven wise economists have been given a special section in the Red Book. Those Gentlemen are no doubt very eminent and they are certainly very well paid. However, it is quite extraordinary to include their opinions in the Government's Red Book to give the impression that they have official backing. That gives far too much importance to those sophisticators and necromancers.

I recognised the same names among the 365 economists who wrote to The Times in 1982 describing the Government's policy as disasterous. There then followed the most sustained period of economic growth since the war.

The public sector borrowing requirement for 1993-94, at £50 billion, is simply too large to finance without considerable difficulty. I remind my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary of a great change that has occurred in just one year. Last year, the Red Book forecast that the PSBR would be £6 billion in 1996-97. After the proposed tax increases of £10 billion, the deficit is still expected to be £35 billion in 1996-97. That makes a total increase of £45 billion. That shows that extraordinary swings are possible in such forecasts.

The debt interest amounts to £19·4 billion next year, which is an increase of £2 billion over the year before. I calculate that if we delay the rising of those taxes, there will be an extra £400 million a year in debt interest. We will not improve matters by issuing IOUs in promises of future high taxation. Of course I understand the reason behind this: it is dangerous to trample on the recovery. However, surely the promise of higher taxation is likely to have an inhibiting effect on spending. Therefore, we might just as well get on with it, if not by the full £17 billion in the first year, certainly in the first two years.

I know that there is much criticism about VAT on fuel and power. We have become accustomed to thinking that increases in VAT will feed straight through into price increases. I do not believe that that will be the case. In Sussex, Seeboard did not increase its prices last year, allowing for the rebate. I believe that there is every prospect that it will reduce its prices this year. That makes the coal review so important.

So long as the nuclear levy is phased out, the extra VAT may be fully absorbed or nearly absorbed within the increase in the cost of living during the next two years or so. I do not know what that will do to carbon emissions and our Rio target, but I doubt whether the increase in the RPI will be as much as some people believe. We must not neglect the capacity of the privatised electricity distributors to absorb costs.

It would have been better if we had got on with it. As it is, £50 billion is a huge sum to finance. Incidentally, I see that we are not going to finance it through full funding—that is, by selling gilts to the non-bank public. Instead, we are to allow the banks to buy gilts which will form their lending base.

In other words—and perhaps in a more complicated way than in the past—we will resort to printing money for the balance of the funds that we will not be able to raise by selling gilts to the non-banking public. The potential for inflation is there. The argument is that as soon as inflation shows signs of taking off, interests rates will rise once more. I wonder whether we will be quite so precise in making that judgment as one would hope. That is why I believe that the very large borrowing requirement leaves too much to chance for my peace of mind.

We will have to keep a close watch on inflationary signals and I hope that action will be taken at the right time. It would have been better not to have such a high PSBR in the first place.

I understand that we will deal with public spending in the next Budget and spending review. However, we must consider the matter carefully. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is carrying out a careful survey of Government Departments. However, I do not believe that that is enough. Choices will have to be made between Departments and we will have to look at the long-term trends.

Defence is an obvious candidate; in that respect, I am talking about equipment and not personnel. If we consider equipment that was authorised over the past 10 years and the original estimates and compare that with the outturn and then note what would have been available at the time and ask what our forces would have preferred, taking into account overseas defence sales, we discover a surprising result.

We must also consider the cost of research and development on defence and the enormous sums involved. We must consider that in the context of an independent think tank to perform much the same function as the Rand Corporation in the United States. I served on the Public Accounts Committee with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) for many years and I do not believe that it is good enough to expect the Ministry of Defence to make the estimates for us. The amount of money that we have spent on defence equipment, much of which has been absolutely wasted, is a standing disgrace. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary should consider the matter very carefully.

The same sort of problem will arise with social security. By the year 2021, one in five of the population will be over 65, compared with one in 10 in 1951. There will be fewer young people to pay. There were only 11·5 million people under 16 in 1988 compared with 14·3 million in 1971. There will be a major problem to tackle in providing for social services in the future.

We must look to the future to see how social services will be provided. We must examine whether social services will need to be provided entirely through the state or whether they could be as they were of old—provided by the friendly societies or in some other way. We need to examine carefully the whole national insurance system and the national insurance fund to see what might be done. There is a great deal of scope.

I commend my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the Budget in all sorts of ways, especially in bringing spending and revenue together. I hope that it will concentrate the mind wonderfully.

7.10 pm

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Value added tax on domestic fuels has been the main talking point in my constituency since the Budget was announced. Indeed, older people can talk of little else. Their fear is already clear: they will not be turning on the heating in the way in which they should simply to protect their welfare in future years. That must be wrong. It was damnable that the Government did not have a plan to ameliorate the effects of that imposition of VAT on those at the margin of poverty. It is an absolute disgrace.

I shall refer to what was in the Chancellor's speech as a veiled but rather gratuitous insult suggesting that, first, his advanced corporation tax proposals were complex and, secondly, they would, as if by definition, be understood by only a few.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the hon. Gentleman one of them?

Mr. Purchase: I do not know; the hon. Gentleman will find out in a moment. He should not second-guess what I have to say.

If it seems to many that the Chancellor—by his lack of common sense, he has got into more scrapes than most—can understand advanced corporation tax, by similar definition it should be possible for the rest of us at least to get a grip of the subject.

Advanced corporation tax was introduced by the Tory Government in 1972-73. Amazingly, it worked well during the 1970s, when companies were making profits and could claim back their tax credits through the mainstream corporation tax. However, since the advent of Conservative anti-manufacturing policies and the determination to reward those who make money through shareholding rather than those who earn it through real work, advanced corporation tax has become a real problem for large and small companies.

The tax system is simple rather than complex. It takes tax which is due at source from those receiving dividends, and is then set off as a credit against mainstream corporation tax. That is done on the assessable profits of the dividend-paying company. The arrangement allows for the Exchequer to gather tax earlier than would otherwise be the case, and sets the final tax bills against that credit.

All that is okay while companies are profitable and able to use the tax credit which they have earned. However, recently companies have been obliged to pay dividends even though they have not made profits. In essence, that has meant that, first, an unprofitable company is producing a tax credit which it cannot reclaim in the relevant period for which it was paid and thus creating a surplus of tax; and, secondly—this is my theme—payment of the dividend has tended to reduce the net worth of such companies by bringing forward retained profits, which are properly intended for investment, to pay shareholders.

On the tax credit and the subsequent surplus advanced corporation tax, the scale of the surplus is estimated at £5 billion. That is a tax mountain equivalent to the infamous EC beef mountain. I do not know whether all the beef will ever be eaten. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) could make a go of it, but we shall have to wait to see whether that works out.

I can say something about the tax mountain. Although companies are allowed to roll forward their credits against future profits, many thousands of firms will never benefit, for the simple reason that the Government have driven them out of business, especially those in manufacturing in the west midlands. Our wealth-creating base has been crucified by, first, the obsession with money supply and, secondly, phenonmenal real interest rates. Although interest rates are falling, they are still some distance from the historic norms of 1 and 2 per cent.

I recall many companies in the west midlands falling under the Thatcher/Howe axe of the early 1980s. I especially remember a typical local firm in Wolverhampton which specified and ordered special machinery—machinery at the cutting edge of technology. The development period was about two years. The plant had scarcely been fully commissioned and brought into profitable use when the monetarist experiment closed down the opportunities in manufacturing for which the special machinery had been planned and designed. The plant was unable to find new markets in time to meet the bank's demand for interest payments. A fine company of good managers and highly skilled workers was finished, and its surplus advanced corporation tax was lost for ever.

Earlier, I said that many companies are forced into making dividend payments even when the current year's profits are non-existent. Such payments eat into the value of a company but are demanded by the short-term considerations of shareholders who have become accustomed to dividends which bear no relation to work or effort, especially in the privatisation programme. The privatisation programme deliberately undervalued share prices and then rewarded those buyers who became sellers —and they were able to make a killing on the way.

In addition, the outrageous levels of interest which were offered to lenders and passed on as loans to borrowers by banks became more profitable and a safer haven for spare cash than the longer-term investments needed by manufacturing industry. Nevertheless, industry had to compete, which meant paying dividends at a time when none should have been available and at rates comparable to those available elsewhere from banks and building societies. In that way, companies were forced to damage themselves to keep the level of traded share values sufficient to attract investors.

The changes to advanced corporation tax which have been trumpeted by the Chancellor should not be seen as unproblematic, except perhaps by the relatively few profitable companies and those which have large overseas earnings. Because the changes could be disadvantageous to pension funds in some circumstances, managers may well be tempted to be cautious and buy gilts rather than take a positive view about the long-term equity and earnings of manufacturers who desperately need a continuing share of investment.

All in all, that aspect of the Budget does not provide a boost for industry. Indeed, the Chancellor claims that the measure will take £900 million in extra revenue from 1995-96 and that the benefit to companies will be restricted merely to reducing the rate at which advanced corporation tax surplus accumulates. Rather than being a boost for industry, the proposal serves to illustrate the appalling mess which has resulted from the Government's damning lack of interest in or knowledge of our country's wealth and welfare-creating manufacturing sector.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Because of the constraints on time imposed by the Speaker, I shall not follow the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) or some of his hon. Friends in the way in which I would have wished in my remarks. I should like to preface my comments by saying that the appropriate test to apply to the Budget is what I would describe as the Barry Riley test. Those who read The Financial Times on Saturdays will know Barry Riley's column. On Saturday 13 March before the Budget, Barry Riley said, among other things:

> "So the government's responsibility is not to engineer some kind of economic miracle, but rather to establish a stable financial framework and to attempt to reconcile people to the real world."

In a world of modest expectations—to which, alas, we have had to become accustomed recently due to the depth of the recession—that admonition from Mr. Riley is especially appropriate. By that test, the Chancellor will be seen to have succeeded—but, most clearly, in some months' time.

The dual curse of all Budgets and debates on Budgets is that commentators and Members of the House tend to rush to judgment, which is usually a mistake. Almost everyone expects too much of a Budget which in this case may tighten the fiscal stance by somewhere between £500 million and £2 billion, depending on how one assesses the real effect, in an economy of more than £600 billion. I remind the House that our economy represents no more than perhaps 3 or 4 percentage points of world gross domestic product. If one puts all these figures together, it is clear that one should have modest expectations for the national Budget of a country of Britain's size and weight in the world.

The Budget measures can be considered in greater and more appropriate detail in later debates on the Finance Bill. I wish to make a few comments on some of the key Budget judgments of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and to examine his overall approach to economic policy. I intend to make my points as quickly as I can for reasons of brevity.

First, my right hon. Friend chose absolutely the right objectives for his Budget at this stage of the economic cycle. He described his objectives in the following words: "first, to support the recovery in the year ahead; and secondly, to set out a clear medium-term strategy for bringing the borrowing requirement back towards balance."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 169.]

Secondly, my right hon. Friend was right to remind the House in his Budget statement of the profound impact of global developments on our national economic well-being. That is a truism, but one which is not sufficiently taken into account. For example, our export markets are principally—although not exclusively—in the rest of the European Community, as Opposition Members will know. Those countries are all going into recession after us, so just when we need them to pull us out on an export-led basis they will not be there in the strength that we would wish.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Forman: I am afraid that I cannot give way in view of the time available.

Equally, there is the super-competitive threat from the Pacific rim countries. That does not exactly assist us other than by sharpening the spur of competition, which is a good thing, of course.

Thirdly, unemployment is obviously the most critical factor in both the symptoms and causes of our economic difficulties. It is responsible in itself, either directly or indirectly, for a large part of both the cyclical deficit and, increasingly, the structural deficit. Indeed, one could argue on that point like mediaeval schoolmen and not get far. It is all deficit, whatever one calls it. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was right to say that a deep-seated problem needs more fundamental solutions. That is what he said about the medium-term deficit. I shall say a few words later about the fundamental solutions.

Fourthly, in the short run, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was also right not to tighten his fiscal stance too much. Here I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and I disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir. P. Hordern). If my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had tightened his fiscal stance too much by taking what would have been largely symbolic action to increase taxes now, that could have had serious behavioural consequences which would have damaged confidence. Confidence is fragile at the moment, and such action would have prejudiced the recovery that we all want to encourage.

It is arguable that any Chancellor should act decisively for one year only at a given time. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing on that. A Chancellor should not imperil or mortgage the future by putting key decision-makers on the financial equivalent of death row —in other words, awaiting future fiscal execution. There is a great deal to be said for the old annuality approach of the Treasury, particularly on the revenue side of the accounts. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's judgment for this year is right, but I hope that he will feel free to loosen policy still further if that proves necessary. He should do so preferably on the monetary side if the behavioural consequences of the Budget produce a half-hearted recovery. I very much hope that they will not, but we must guard against the possibility.

The growth in the economy in the next few years predicted in the Red Book, coupled with the underlying growth in productivity, which goes ahead almost regardless of recessions because it is a function of technology, and so on, will probably not be enough to reduce unemployment or significantly lift economic confidence for at least the next three years. That needs to be considered. With that sombre prospect, my right hon. Friend was right to say:

"Our strategy for sustained growth rests on three principles: first, that growth comes from the private sector, not from Whitehall; secondly, that a continuing commitment to low inflation is vital if competitiveness is to be maintained; and thirdly, that the only way to increase the country's long-term growth rate is by improving the supply side performance of the economy."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 172.]

I agree with that.

The process of recovery is also critically dependent on events with a capital E outside the United Kingdom and largely outside my right hon. Friend's influence, let alone his control. Therefore, any British Government must concentrate on doing the positive things which are in their control. That is why I welcome so much the support for improved quantity and quality in our education and training system, and I was pleased to be involved with the recently planned boost for further education, which will do important things of benefit to Britain's competitiveness. That makes some of the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir Edward Heath) on that point slightly dated.

Looking to the future, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor may have been right to say:

"interest rates at their current level are consistent with the achievement of the Government's inflation objectives."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 173.]

That may well be true, but the dilemma is that we shall probably need a sustained period of even lower interest rates to give us a real chance of achieving our objectives for economic growth. It is the old conflict between the growth interest and the anti-inflation interest.

My right hon. Friend was right to warn of the medium-term threat of excessive public borrowing, especially when it starts as a cyclical deficit and could easily degenerate into a structural deficit unless we safeguard against it. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham said, it is significant that next year the debt interest is likely to amount to almost 3 per cent. of GDP. That is pushing up towards the limit set in the Maastricht guidelines.

Both the personal and corporate sectors are rapidly restoring their balance sheets and will soon move into surplus rather than deficit. That would imply a further period of debt deflation. It is appropriate that the public sector should have a countervailing deficit until the effects of the private sector purgative have worn off and confidence and growth have reappeared. In other words, timing is everything. We cannot afford to allow the deficit to continue into the medium term. That is why it was essential that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor took the measures that he did. Equally, however, he was right to be cautious in the forthcoming financial year.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's determination to take a radical look at what the public sector does, and how. Indeed, he intends to examine the very boundaries and definitions of the public and private sectors respectively. That is likely to yield much bigger savings and make a much larger contribution to eliminating the public sector deficit than even the hardest fought public expenditure survey round.

I illustrate the argument with some examples. Should we continue for ever with a universal state pension and different pension ages for men and women? Probably not. Should we make a sustained attack on the tax expenditures and structural reliefs which now cost the Exchequer at least £90 billion—or £30 billion, according to the narrow definition? Those are some of the long-term questions that we need to consider. I commend the Budget for addressing them.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): After the general election, unhappily I found that I represented not just Thurrock but a large proportion of south-east England. Apart from my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who are on the geographical edge of the south-east region, I am the only Opposition Member in the south-east outside Greater London. That gives me a special responsibility to speak for millions of people who are suffering the full brunt of the Government's policies and feel betrayed.

More than half a million people are unemployed in the south-east region outside Greater London. The rate of male unemployment is 12 to 13 per cent. and I believe that it is rising. That area can legitimately be described as Thatcher's country, as the people who live in the south-east gave the Conservative party its successive parliamentary majorities and they now feel particularly betrayed by the Budget.

People in the south-east can remember the 1979 poster, "Britain under Labour isn't working", which showed a queue of allegedly unemployed people. If that poster were replicated today, there is not a billboard in the land that could accommodate the length of the queue—I should love us to try to construct one. In 1979 there were 1·1 million unemployed people. Now it is 4 million. Half a million in the south-east, outside Greater London, are unemployed, and languishing in the dole queue. Many of them have no hope of retrieving their quality and standard of life.

One year ago, many of those people fell for the lie that the cost of a Labour Government would be £1,250 per annum for each family. They heard the Prime Minister say, "Vote Conservative on Thursday and the recovery continues on Friday." Now these people, many of whom are unemployed, and have lost their businesses during the past year, are wondering which Friday the Prime Minister was referring to. Has it been? Is it yet to come? Is it Good Friday? They have been betrayed and they know that the cost of electing a Conservative Government one year ago has been much more than £1,250. Many of them are on short-time working and many have lost their jobs or their businesses. It is time that the Conservative Government were indicted for cheating at the polls and for betraying the people of the United Kingdom.

During the debate, Conservative Members have boasted, with a great deal of relief, about the slight drop in unemployment last week; but that is not the pattern in south-east England. Unemployment has increased in the counties of Essex, West and East Sussex and Berkshire and in many constituencies and travel-to-work areas including Crawley, Slough, Brighton and Heathrow. Unemployment is up and people cannot escape the fact that there is no sign that the rate will abate during the coming months.

Throughout the region there is great anger at the way that the Government are clutching at straws, in this minor decrease in the figures, and at their apparent indifference to the unemployed and to those who are struggling to maintain small businesses in which they have invested their life savings and who are working seven days a week and doing everything that they can to protect and promote the interests of their families. The situation is tragic and Conservative Members are to blame because of their indifference and the policies that they have prosecuted during the past 14 years and not merely the past 12 months.

In my county and in Kent, Harlow has more than 5,500 unemployed. Dover and Gravesend both have more than 5,000, while more than 6,500 betrayed people of Basildon are unemployed.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell) rose——

Mr. Mackinlay: No, I shall not give way because I do not have time and because the President of the Board of Trade discourteously refused to give way when I tried to speak on behalf of the people of south-east England just over a week ago.

We have been told that the Labour party is talking Britain down—what hypocrisy and humbug. The fact is that we wish to protect and to promote the people of this country and its enterprise and industry.

The President of the Board of Trade painted a picture of time and space. He did not mention what we expected to hear—what will be done to create employment and maintain enterprise in the United Kingdom and particularly in the south-east, which is my concern. Instead, he took us to every corner of the globe and back in time. He even referred to George Brown, as if he were to blame for the present situation. The Chancellor's Parliamentary Private Secretary was four when George Brown came to office and he was 18 when the Conservatives came to office. It was a long time ago. Only one group of people are to blame for the situation that the country is in—it is Conservative Members who have presided over Britain's decline and let Britain down.

Great play is made of the fact that the Government have brought down inflation. Certainly it is down substantially but that is no achievement if there are 4 million unemployed and if businesses are going bust. Surely, the art and skill of government should be to temper and to balance those difficult areas, to ensure that one constrains inflation as well as maintaining employment. The Government have singularly failed to do so.

Conservative Members have said a great deal about patriotism and implied that somehow we are letting Britain down. I and other Opposition Members are proud of our country, of its hills and landscape, of its great history and culture, and, above all, we are proud of its people. What is a nation but its people? Our people are being stabbed in the back by the Government's total indifference to the plight of those languishing in the dole queues, of those whose businesses are going bust and of the retired and poor people of this land, who will have to pick up the tab because of the imposition of value added tax on their essential fuel.

That is the failure of the Government, and it is only the beginning—a trailer for subsequent Budgets, when the Government will extend the base of VAT, which will hit the poorest hardest. Labour Members are making a stand and the Labour party will resist that all the way. We shall watch tonight as Conservative Members go into the Lobby to support the Chancellor who hit the poorest hardest.

The Chancellor's reference to the channel tunnel route was another feature of the Budget and it was a smoke screen for his inactivity and not knowing where to go. The Secretary of State for Transport also referred to the route in a statement this afternoon. The route, they argue, is important for the regeneration of south-east England and to create jobs. We must distinguish between enterprise which will create jobs in the south-east and this particular route, which is perverse and is dictated partly by the fact that the Chancellor needed something to divert attention from his inadequacies this week and partly to minimise the political impact on Conservative seats in Kent and south-east London.

The route has not been tested against any of the normal planning criteria that should be applied in a democratic country. If you wanted to put up a structure in your back garden, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or if you decided to build an airport in Northampton, you would have to go through a rigorous planning application, and no doubt if you were refused you would have access to a planning inquiry. The people of Kent and of south-east England are being denied that opportunity over the channel tunnel route, and that is outrageous. The route has been brought to us as a smoke screen, which shows that we have a bankrupt Government who have repeatedly failed over employment and the environment.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I represent a constituency in the heart of England, in the centre of the car and car component manufacturing areas, and I am joint chairman of the all-party motor industry group—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I thank my colleagues for their encouragement.

I have carefully examined the effect of the Budget on new car sales. The combination of the autumn statement and the removal of special car tax, which seems to have been forgotten, as well as aspects of measures in the Budget, have been helpful. As a result, in December, car sales in the home market were extremely encouraging, especially sales of Rover cars. I welcomed the President of the Board of Trade's mention of Rover, which has its headquarters in my constituency. In addition, in terms of export sales, would my hon. Friend the Minister pass on to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor the fact that the Peugeot 405 model sold in France is made at Ryton in Coventry on the edge of my constituency, which is a marvellous achievement?

Land Rover has also increased its sales through exports, as has Vauxhall, Ford and the Japanese manufacturers who have moved to Britain. The doom and gloom spread by Opposition Members ignores the fact that we not only managed to attract Nissan, the first Japanese car manufacturing company to come to Britain, which is now exporting cars made in Britain to Japan, but Peugeot, which is making French cars in Coventry and exporting them to France. They are not French cars but British ones. We have also attracted Toyota and Honda. All those companies have encouraged and sustained many component manufacturers. We have created a car manufacturing base that is a vast improvement on that of the past.

Opposition Members often get confused because our productivity rate is now so competitive that it no longer requires a high level of employment. Our output has improved greatly, but, because of that improved efficiency, there are fewer available jobs.

How has the Budget helped the car industry? The changes to car tax have produced excellent results, but I am rather suspicious about the changes in fuel duties and the recoupment of £750 million. The figures that have been provided to me by the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, Ford and others suggest that between £1 billion and £1·1 billion has been recouped as a result of the changes in vehicle excise duty and the fuel duties. That is a lot more than £750 million, and I would be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor could comment on that difference.

The Budget was a lost opportunity, because if those who use leaded petrol had been penalised heavily, that could have provided a great encouragement to the use of unleaded fuel and diesel. I was disappointed that that was not done, because that change could have offered an environmental improvement. It could also have recouped some of the revenues lost when the Government got rid of the special car tax, which was a welcome move.

The future establishment of a simple system of company car taxation would be most welcome, because it is important. The Government have gone down the right route by offering a 35 per cent. discount, but I have a number of questions for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. He said that, overall, the changes would have a neutral effect and that there would be gainers and losers. I believe that the proposals may create losers because some people's companies may have negotiated a low price for a car. In the proposed six or nine-month period, how will my right hon. Friend establish the cost of such a car?

If one company gets a better discount than another, will that be reflected in the taxation on an employee? Will the cost of the Austin Montego or the Rover 800 be established as a national figure in terms of the price at which a company could buy such cars, or will certain companies get a better deal?

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): It is calculated on the list price.

Mr. Mills: The changes relate to the cost price. Those in the industry were aiming for the list price.

Mr. Dorrell: The answer is that the assessment will be made on the list price.

Mr. Mills: I am glad to know that, because I was not clear about the actual cost involved. If a company can get a better discount, however, that can create confusion, which is somewhat unfair.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Minister has seen the article in today's edition of The Daily Telegraph, which states that the latest changes may discourage company car use. That is something I fear. A saving of perhaps £510 on a two-litre or 1·8 litre car could result if a person gave up his company car and bought a car or was given money by his company to do that. That would result in a great loss of revenue to the Treasury. It would also lead to lower company car sales. I am keen to encourage such sales, because those cars are normally produced in Britain by manufacturers of all kinds rather than imported.

Representatives of Rolls-Royce came to talk to the all-party motor industry group and expressed great concern about possible changes in the Budget. I have spoken to Mr. Peter Ward, the chairman of Rolls-Royce, in the Select Committee on Employment, and I have corresponded with him in detail about the Budget changes. I have also written to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about them, because I am concerned about how they will affect that company, which is facing great difficulties. The President of the Board of Trade referred to that company's success, but largely in terms of the aerospace industry.

There may not be too much sympathy from Opposition Members for Rolls-Royce owners, but under the changes proposed in the Budget, as the result of the new formula, some of those owners will be paying more than £7,000 in terms of their personal obligations to the Inland Revenue through taxation. That may seem a tiny sum in view of the cost of those cars, but given today's depressed market, there is every likelihod that the sale of Rolls-Royce cars will be seriously affected at a time when that company is close to its margins on performance.

It is desperately important to consider that issue, because the new arrangement imposes a burden of taxation on Rolls-Royce cars that is totally disproportionate to that imposed on other manufacturers. I shall be glad to correspond with the Financial Secretary on this, but I should appreciate his initial thoughts. The Chancellor should impose a cap on the new price structure at no more than £60,000 to avoid such unfair discrimination and distortion.

The effect of the Budget changes on home market car sales will be neutral, provided that those changes do not lead to a change from company car ownership. I am slightly disappointed about formula one motor racing cars. I know that the Financial Secretary is aware that their manufacture represents a major, high-technology industry in the south-east. Our industry dominates motor racing throughout the world. Despite the sad loss of our hero, Nigel Mansell, those companies will still produce the cars and the technology. I congratulate Nigel on his win in Australia on Sunday, and I wish that he would come back and join us.

Capital allowances would have helped motor racing as well as many other industries. I know the complex arguments about the advantages and disadvantages of such allowances, but it is important to encourage high-technology industries such as the manufacture of formula one motor racing cars. I am aware, however, that the extension of such allowances would provide widespread and unspecific help to industries, but I should appreciate my hon. Friend's comments on that.

As a member of the Select Committee on Employment, and as an hon. Member, I welcome the change in VAT regulations on horses. I congratulate the Paymaster General on his excellent ability to listen with sympathy and to make the right judgment on this matter. I am speaking on behalf not of the owners, but of the many thousands of people who are employed as grooms and stable lads, and in other occupations in the horseracing industry. I know that those Opposition Members who are punters will agree that the change is a good move.

I must end on a slightly negative note, however. When I met members of my association and others at the weekend, the concern about VAT on heating fuels was marked. The imposition of VAT will take place in two stages, but it is causing great concern to pensioners who are above the income support level.

Many such pensioners live in the older parts of my constituency, such as Castle Bromwich, and they feel that their savings have been eroded, particularly those who are dependent on the return on savings. The low levels of interest rates may be excellent for industry, but they offer a poor rate of return for those who have savings and who depend on interest payments. I ask the Financial Secretary to consider the effects of the VAT imposition on those pensioners who are not on income support.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The speeches by Conservative Back Benchers could be described as downbeat, pessimistic and almost fatalistic. I hope that they have considered the economic aggregates that lie behind the Budget, because they would certainly then know that economics could be considered the dismal science.

In the past week, I have been greatly impressed by the writings of Anatole Kaletsky in The Times. On 17 March, he wrote:

> "Mr. Lamont is assuming that the economy will never grow by more than 2·75 per cent. a year in the foreseeable future. Last year, even when the economy was still in the depth of recession, the medium-term assumptions always contained several years of 3·5 per cent. growth."

That raises an important and serious point, particularly for an economy that faces a £50,000 million deficit in its public sector borrowing requirement.

A 2·5 per cent. average growth rate will not be enough to close that deficit in the economy. That inevitably means that extremely painful choices will have to be made about tax increases. It also shows the mirage of the so-called economic miracle of the 1980s.

One might expect that any restructuring of the United Kingdom economy after the longest and most prolonged recession in living memory would bounce the economy dramatically into recovery. In fact, the Chancellor's figures do not forecast a bounce back in the economy, but a stagger back into some form of positive growth. It will be extremely difficult to square the circle of the £50 billion deficit in the public sector borrowing requirement and the disappointing growth rates predicted in the Chancellor's figures.

In terms of the economic aggregates, the underlying reality of the balance of payments shows a £12 billion deficit at the pits of the recession. That deficit is forecast to rise to £17 billion over the coming year. Although there will be some quantity effect after the depreciation of sterling, it is arguable that there is no equilibrium in the United Kingdom's balance of payments, and successive devaluations of sterling will chase down an economy that is fundamentally out of balance and out of equilibrium. It may be that the destruction of vast parts of the manufacturing sector over the 1980s has been so great that there are now black holes in the economy that will keep it in a permanent state of disequilibrium.

The dismal truth of those two underlying statistics is that there will be a strong emphasis on chasing the tail of recession, with constant tax increases, in a vain attempt to close a PSBR deficit which, because of the underlying poor performance of the economy, cannot be closed. That process would occur whatever Government were in charge of the United Kingdom, as the underlying message of the Budget is that Britain is bankrupt.

It is true that other Governments elsewhere have faced tough choices on tax increases. However, the difference between our Chancellor and President Clinton is that, when the President faced a tough choice over tax increases, he tried to ensure that the taxes fell on those who were able to pay them, whereas every choice taken by the Chancellor has aimed taxation at those least able to pay. Every decision has been aggressive, which means that the losers of the boom of the 1980s will turn into the double losers of the recession through the 1990s.

I shall mention three aspects of the Budget that are not just anti-poor—as the whole Budget is—but produce anti-Scottish effects. The first of those aspects involves the constant year-by-year increases in petrol taxation.

Rural regions will suffer greatly, and transport costs in the Scottish economy will increase substantially. Those of us who are active in Scottish politics remember only too well the Kincardine and Deeside by-election, when the Liberal Democrats were slated by the Secretary of State for Scotland for proposing, not a constant annual increase, but a one-off increase, in petrol duty. The Secretary of State for Scotland waxed eloquent about the impact of that surcharge—as it was called—on the rural areas and the economy of Scotland, but now the Chancellor's Budget predicts a substantial year-by-year impost on petrol duty.

The petrol increase might have been defended in environmental terms if some consequent attempt had been made to reinforce the transport infrastructure north of the border to sustain and develop the public transportation system. However, all the investments in public transport in the Budget are made in the south-east of England, where billions more pounds are being poured into the transport infrastructure. The Budget contains nothing for anywhere north of Potters Bar.

The second aspect involves oil taxation. The Chancellor announced with a flourish that he was abolishing some aspects of petroleum revenue taxation. Some commentators were even gullible enough to describe that measure as a boost for the oil industry. The consequence of the taxation will be perhaps as much as £600 million accrued by the Exchequer from the oil industry over the next year or so.

There is a case for increasing oil taxation at a boom time, because oil is a cyclical industry, and a taxation increase can be defended as a means of lowering the pressure of demand in the sector. But what possible case can there be for increasing taxation when the sector is already depressed? The immediate impact of the Chancellor's Budget measures announced last Tuesday has been the cancellation of drilling contracts in the North sea over the weekend, and hundreds of job losses in a sector that was already moving into a downturn.

The third aspect was the taxation on heating—by far the most controversial measure in the Budget. For many years, the Scottish National party has argued for a cold climate allowance to take account of the fact that, in some areas of Scotland, it costs 30 per cent. more to heat a home than in the south-east of England. We did not expect to achieve that allowance from the Government, but even we did not expect a cold climate surcharge, with the Budget measures increasing that disadvantage.

A number of statistics lie behind my concern. The report "Warm Homes in Cold Weather", released in October 1991, showed that, while deaths in January between 1976 and 1984 were 4 per cent. above the monthly average in west Germany, and 7 per cent. above the average in Sweden and Norway, deaths in Scotland in January were 16 per cent. higher than the average. Many Chancellors have been slated for not acting on the cost of living, but the present Chancellor deals in statistics that involve the cost of dying—the most severe aspect of the Budget.

Scotland is the most energy-rich country in Europe, and one of the most environmentally sensitive in terms of energy production. The Scottish electricity industry is either low-carbon or no-carbon in its production. It is ironic that poor people in Scotland—pensioners and those on low incomes—will suffer poverty amid plenty. Those are the serious effects of the Chancellor's Budget, which will not save the world through green taxation. The Budget sacrifices the poor and those most vulnerable in Scottish society and society elsewhere.

The House should vote against the first Budget resolution, on amendment of the law. If we passed that resolution, it would gag and bind the Bill in Committee. The first resolution does not allow subsequent discussion of the Bill to include any amendment proposing zero rating or reduced rates of value added tax. If the first Budget resolution is passed this evening, it will mean that, in Committee, hon. Members will have no chance to move zero rating on fuel for specific categories or even to lower the rate for some categories. No Minister has specified the amounts and funds available to help those most vulnerable in society as a result of the Budget impost. It would be incredible if, in Committee, hon. Members could not substantially amend the measure.

I have heard concern expressed on the issue, both over the weekend and by Conservative Members tonight. Even if they are not prepared to vote directly against the Budget measure, they should at least vote against the first resolution. Unless we vote against it this evening, it will be impossible later to ensure justice for the pensioners and those most vulnerable in society.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): We are having a most interesting debate and I have much sympathy with a number of the contributions that have been made—not least that of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). I particularly agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden said about Rolls-Royce motors. The Budget will greatly penalise one of the great motor companies of this country. It produces expensive cars, but I do not believe that its production should be penalised, as the Budget has done.

I am deeply concerned about the impact of placing value added tax on heating and light, and the effect that it will have on those on low income, the unemployed and the elderly. I refer particularly to those on low incomes who fall just outside eligibility for assistance available under state income-related benefits.

Unless we get categorical assurances from the Government that the position of these groups will be fully taken into account in respect of this large additional impost, I shall not be able to support the Government's measure.

I come from an area where we have a good balance of industry and an excellent range of manufacturing industries, modern and traditional—Zeneca plc, the pharmaceutical division of ICI, Ciba plc, and a number of video technology, information technology and computer companies. We also have many companies in the traditional industries of textiles and clothing, such as Rieter Scragg, Mowbrays, Cressys and Adamley Textiles. These are traditional but still substantial employers, I am glad to say. We also have paper and board companies, and engineering firms, so we have a fine balance. I always seek to participate in these debates from a position of knowledge of manufacturing industry.

When I spoke in the debate nearly a fortnight ago I made six suggestions for consideration by the Government: the introduction of 100 per cent. capital allowances; a commitment to a further reduction in interest rates; the abolition of stamp duty; the creation of a new task force to identify import substitution; a more favourable tax regime for fees for part-time study; and an explicit political commitment to promote British exports. I also called for a review of our laws on liquidation and bankruptcy.

For the very first time, the Chancellor has shown a receptiveness to the vital role that our manufacturing and construction industries play in providing employment and generating wealth. I am aware of the difficult balancing act that the Chancellor had to perform between the need to deal in the medium term with the threat of a spiralling PSBR and the need to ensure that the first weak breaths of economic recovery were not stifled by the dead hand of swingeing tax increases.

I make these comments to show that I fully appreciate the problems faced by the Government and that I welcome the greater attention that is being paid to our manufacturing and construction industries. The Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, launched in this House about three weeks ago, together with the new all-party manufacturing group launched by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) and the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), and the initiatives in which the CBI and the Engineering Employers Federation are involved, have, I hope, had something of a catalytic, if not a causal, effect in concentrating the attention of the House and of Ministers on these important sectors.

It is also clear that the Chancellor sought to deal with a number of the principles that I highlighted by giving greater and welcome assistance to our exporters through a boost in the export credit guarantee schemes, by reviewing the stamp duty on the sale of houses in the lower price bands, and by renewing his commitment to greater public spending, in partnership with the private sector, on infrastructure development projects. I also warmly welcome the change to the loan guarantee scheme, which will cut the cost and improve the availability of bank finance for smaller businesses. We want more long-term, fixed-interest loan schemes. We want more equity taken by the clearing banks, and fewer businesses financed by overdrafts.

There is also much-needed help for small businesses in the form of a review of VAT procedures and an extension of the freezing of the business rate. Many thousands of small and not so small businesses will greatly benefit.

If the Chancellor, however, is being asked by the House to walk a tightrope between curbing the PSBR and encouraging economic growth, we should not overlook the fact that he is being required also to juggle. If, as the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have both said, the conditions for economic growth—low inflation and low interest rates—are in place, then, in the absence of growth, we must look around for the missing factor in the equation. It is, of course, consumer confidence. In the months ahead, the success or otherwise of last week's Budget will be assessed against its impact on consumer spending intentions.

That view, expressed by the alliance last week in a press release, is echoed by Mr. Howard Davies of the CBI, who, writing in the current edition of "The House Magazine", comments on the possible impact of the tax increases that have been announced by rightly saying:

"There is a risk that they will affect spending decisions this year"—

not in the years thereafter. If the fears of the alliance and the CBI prove to be justified, the Chancellor's Budget will have failed to give consumer confidence the boost that is so desperately required, and the overall impact of his proposals will not be, as he has said, neutral: they will be negative.

When I spoke two weeks ago in a debate about manufacturing and construction, I called on all political parties to lay the foundations for a new cultural and political consensus that places the needs, problems and potential of these industries firmly on the parliamentary agenda. The intentions behind the Budget show that the Chancellor's mind is receptive to the proposals that I espouse, but, unfortunately, its practical proposals clearly show that he is not with us yet.

I ask the Paymaster General to assure me that any responsible proposals for greater help for manufacturers and exporters that are suggested in subsequent debates on the Finance Bill will be given careful and sympathetic consideration; and that if we make a convincing case for the introduction of 100 per cent. capital allowances, for example, it will be accepted and policies will be changed as a result.

We have heard some first-class contributions to this debate. I am delighted to see the right hon. Member for Ashton-under Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) in his place. I agreed with much of what he said; it is only a pity that so few hon. Members are present to be influenced by these considered speeches. When we come to vote, we will be voting not on the merit of the debate but in accordance with party lines. That is tragic, because there is great ability in all parts of the House.

Hon. Members on both sides have taken up the cudgels on behalf of manufacturing and construction. Let that expertise, experience and knowledge be put to good effect, so that we can once again regenerate the only source of non-inflationary economic growth: our manufacturing base. If we do, we will pass on a legacy to future generations of which the House and this Government can be proud.

8.7 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). I represent the manufacturing capital of Britain. A higher percentage of people in Pendle than in any other constituency in the land work in manufacturing industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) opened the debate by referring to the fact—it is a fact—that the Government cheated their way back to power last 9 April. I want to pick up that theme, and to return to the Tory manifesto, "The Best Future for Britain".

Manifestos are important, and this one is no exception. It represents a contract entered into between the Government and the people, so the Conservative manifesto cannot be lightly cast aside after 11 short months. In that time a great many things have been cast aside, most notably honesty. The whole political process in Britain has been corrupted by this Government, who told the British people that the Conservatives are "the only party that understands the need for low taxation."

That rings hollow now.

In the foreword to that manifesto the Prime Minister told the British people that he believed in low taxes—no doubt in the same way that he believed that the Government's duty should be "to protect the value of the currency without which all spending pledges are worthless."

That was the man who devalued our currency. I doubt now whether he could talk about pledges, manifesto or otherwise, without being blown away in a gale of laughter. His pledges are totally devalued.

The right hon. Gentleman used to believe in manifesto pledges and the mandates that they conferred. On 29 October, The Times informed us that he told a packed meeting of the 1992 Committee—in the context of the internal debate within the Tory party on Maastricht, which rages now as it did then:

"The Conservative manifesto was not an à la carte menu from which they"—

that is, Conservative Members—

"could merely pick the juicy items."

The fact is that the manifesto was not a menu at all; it was a work of fiction.

At the CBI conference on 9 October last year, Mr. Philip Goldenberg of S. J . Berwin told the delegates, if that is what they were:

"If the Government's election manifesto had been a company prospectus it would have had the entire Cabinet in jail."

Quite so, but it is not just fabrication and invention that characterise the Government's record—it is also incompetence. The chairman of GKN, Sir David Lees, told the same conference:

"A new economic theorem is developing known as Lamont's Law. It states that any economic indicator will invariably turn down once the Chancellor identifies it as a portent of economic recovery."

He was telling us something that we already knew about—the green shoots syndrome.

People have woken up to the difference between what the Chancellor has been telling them and what has actually been happening. The scale of duplicity and mendacity perpetrated on the people of Britain is truly spectacular. The Sunday Times, in an excellent editorial yesterday, said that the Budget was not "a budget for growth, or for jobs, or for business though it should have been for all three . . . It was a budget to pay for the past mistakes of John Major and Norman Lamont."

There have been many mistakes.

The Prime Minister of manufacturing presides over the relentless deindustrialisation of Britain. In my constituency a fortnight ago, Progress Engineering went down the tube, taking 40 jobs with it. Last week Wadkin Colne of Trawden folded, with a loss of 65 jobs. Those come on top of the cascade of job losses in my constituency month on month and year on year.

The Prime Minister believes in protecting the value of the currency, but devalues at a move costing the country £5 billion. The Prime Minister pulled out of the exchange rate mechanism, although he had said that staying in the ERM was absolutely central to the Government's policy. The Prime Minister won the election on the basis of slogans such as "A double whammy" and "Labour's tax bombshell", but went on to hike taxes massively. I do not know what is worse—what was perpetrated on the British people 11 months ago, or what happened in 1979 when Saatchi and Saatchi said, "Labour isn't working" and employment stood at 1·1 million: there are now 3 million unemployed.

The £17·5 billion tax rise announced in the Budget is the biggest in British history. Allowances have been frozen, mortgage tax relief has been cut and value added tax has been loaded on to domestic fuel. Yet at the end of our debates on the Budget there are still no cast-iron guarantees that the poorest in society will be fully compensated. As the hon. Member for Macclesfield said, it is people just above the income support level who lose, and who will always lose unless there are such guarantees.

What does it all mean for people in my region? In the north-west, 1,130,000 households will lose because MIRAS is to be restricted to the 20 per cent. rate and some 2,734,000 people will pay higher tax bills because allowances and thresholds have been frozen. Despite everything that the Government said at the time of the election about national insurance contributions—they lambasted Labour for its plan to remove the ceiling—there is to be a 1 per cent. rise which will affect 18 million employees generally, and 2,405,000 in the north-west. Raising national insurance contributions is more regressive than a 1p rise in income tax because of the lower levels at which people start paying contributions.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said, about 500,000 people on wages so low that they do not pay income tax will be caught by the increases in national insurance contributions. What a state of affairs. The Sunday Times yesterday said that income tax was effectively being increased in the Budget through the sleight of hand of an extra 1 per cent. on national insurance contributions. Sleight of hand comes easily to a Chancellor who is also a conjuror and a member of the Magic Circle. However, it is not how everyone sees the Budget.

I was speaking at a lunch meeting of the Pendle business club last Friday, which was presided over by Mr. Philip McIvor, the chairman of Farmhouse Biscuits. He told the meeting that the Budget was a Budget for jobs. That was pure fantasy, especially in Pendle where unemployment has risen by 85 per cent. since the Prime Minister entered No. 10. In the constituency in 1991—almost predating the current deep recession—269 companies registered for VAT, but 285 deregistered. It is not a Budget for jobs. In so far as Britain is pulling out of the recession, it is because there is a more competitive exchange rate which is likely to encourage export-led growth. That is purely fortuitous, because of what happened on 16 September when the Prime Minister and the Chancellor pulled Britain out of the ERM.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) said that he feared for the future of Britain because of the destruction of so much of our industrial base. Lord Prior, a former Conservative Cabinet Minister, said that it would take 20 years to repair the damage that has been done——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

8.17 pm

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Before discussing taxation and spending, I want to refer to what happened in Warrington on the weekend.

We have our debates and our arguments; other people use bombs and bleeding, bullets and maiming as a substitute for political argument. I believe that the House would want the message to go out that we prefer debate and rational argument.

If people want to put a point of view on Irish nationalism, they should get elected and come here, or get more than 2 per cent. of the votes for the Dail and speak in the Irish Parliament. They should not destroy children and crucify three-year-olds in pursuit of political argument.

The Government should be praised for giving so much information to the House and to the country. In the autumn statement, they provided "Public Expenditure Analyses"—Cm. 2219—and gave most of the hints and clues on tax expenditure in appendix D, pages 135 to 138. In effect, they stated the options that they would be considering for reducing some of the gap between spending and taxation.

In terms of extra duty on motor fuels, the Government were right. There are also strong arguments for their proposal to impose value added tax on domestic fuel. I criticise those hon. Members and commentators who take it for granted that some of the factors that increase fuel costs cannot easily be changed. Sixty per cent. of pensioners live in homes that have inadequate heating systems. That should be tackled under a five-year programme that would create worthwhile work for those who need it most—in the same way that we tackled roofing problems some time ago during an earlier period of high unemployment.

This coming week, we shall see the end of the coal obligation on generating companies—the requirement for them to pay an extra £1,000 million for the higher price of coal. The cost of burning coal to generate electricity and the extra profit margin involved probably have the same effect as VAT on domestic fuel. That obligation was accepted because it was felt that keeping more people under ground was a good thing, even though the cost must be met by electricity consumers. We have already heard that a higher proportion of that cost will be paid by those on low incomes, or the cost will account for a higher proportion of the incomes of those who are not earning. We should be realistic about both.

In the same way, I suspect that some hon. Members and people outside the House would have regarded it as better if the cost of domestic gas had remained as high as in 1986, when British Gas was privatised, to avoid the 17·5 per cent. VAT imposition over the next two years, even if that made people worse off. After privatisation and competition, the real price of gas has become 20 per cent. lower than it has been, so even a 17·5 per cent. increase on that reduced index would have left users better off. We must be rational.

As to reducing unemployment levels, I have a horror of not just the way that the coal communities appeared to have been disregarded but of the way that the debate has developed. If last autumn's argument was for an extra £100 million of spending a month to maintain an extra 25,000 jobs in mining communities, that represents £4,000 per miner job per month, or £48,000 a year.

On the fringes of my constituency in south-east London, seven miles from this place, is the Woolwich Arsenal site. Over the past 70 years, it has lost 73,000 jobs —the equivalent of a colliery closing every single year for 70 years. The last 1,000 jobs go this year. Unemployment is running at 60 per cent. in the Arsenal ward of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker). That affects many of my constituents as well.

A city challenge application asked for £12 million a year over five years—a total of £60 million—to generate between 2,000 and 4,000 jobs, with much private sector money coming in as well. It would have involved a development on derelict land seven miles from Westminster.

We should ask whether the Government can rationally decide expenditure over and above the level of their taxation revenue, and whether the subsidy provided by the consumer or taxpayer to help transition in the mining industry could not be partly diverted to meet some of the city challenge applications that could not be approved by the Department of Environment. Both the economic and employment effects would be substantially better—in the same way that an extra £500 million of capital investment in British Rail and London Underground would have a better economic and employment effect than transition being delayed too long for too many pits.

Getting the framework of taxation right does not get proper attention. If I had longer to speak, I might question whether there should not be the same VAT arrangements in respect of greyhounds as those made for horses. Why should not the sport of kings' arrangement work for those of us who are going to the dogs?

I praise the Government for acknowledging that they have lost £500 million a year in revenue on whisky—with or without an "e". We find that, because of fashion, recession and strangling the golden goose, whisky sales have been declining. In leaving whisky out of the count, and reducing the duty on that and other spirits, there may be a rebalance and people will be able to make a choice —especially when they are not driving.

We should also examine the properness of tax expenditure. I have argued for most of my 17 years in the House that mortgage interest relief is counter-productive. I repeat also my comments on previous occasions about personal allowances. It is back to the Grey Book, which details the large sums of tax forgone by permitting personal allowances—and I refer not just to the married man's personal allowance. I welcome its reduction to 20 per cent. I would reduce the personal allowance to 20 per cent. and do the same in many other areas, so that help is concentrated where people need it.

I remind of the House for the reason for the child benefit scheme, which was not mentioned in the Budget because it is dealt with relatively automatically. Child benefit is not a form of income support. I suspect that the Treasury would do better to wrap up the Department of Social Security and make its functions an adjunct to the Treasury, in the same way that the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are.

There are further important measures to be taken in respect of income support. Child benefit should not be part of that. What is the justification for a cash child allowance? Looking at the family life cycle in social and economic policies, when people have children their taxable capacity is reduced and their needs increase. That is the justification for the allowance. It should not be a tax allowance that gives most help to people in the 40 per cent. tax band, about the same help to those in the 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. band, and no help to those below the tax threshold. Would it be better to have a flat cash allowance? The answer is yes.

My right hon. and noble Friend Lady Thatcher understood that, which is why in 1983 and after what I call the Lawson fallacy on child benefit, she made sure that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Secretary of State for Social Security increased it. She understood, but we often forget. Every three or four years, it is worth making the argument again out in the open.

If I had time to make a longer speech, I would talk about the effects of the Budget on trade. It is right, too, to encourage small business.

We should ask when we will be willing to give up tax benefits at some stage or in some circumstances so that others—or people like ourselves in different circumstances —can gain more benefit either from tax expenditure, real benefits, or the chance of employment.

It is not a question of from whom we will take and to whom we will give. It is in each person's life cycle. When will they be willing to give up what they have, so that they and others can gain it when they need it?

Matching needs and resources better requires a debate that goes beyond the scope of a Budget debate. I hope that is something that Labour's social justice commission will examine and that the Tory party will find a way of making that match. I hope that some of those issues will be considered across the Floor of the House, so that the Budget deficit will be reduced, people's well-being will be increased, and avoidable disadvantage, stress and handicap are minimised.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Budget stands condemned on four grounds. It contains broken promises, offers no hope to the unemployed, is based on a Government act of faith that recovery will somehow occur, and provides no means of dealing with the British economy's long-term structural problems.

We are told that, at the time of the 1992 general election, the Government had no plans to increase the scope of value added tax. Those are weasel words. The majority of people who voted for a Conservative Government did so in the firm belief that VAT would not be levied on goods or services such as domestic fuel during the lifetime of this Parliament. For the Government to claim now that they had no such plans in 1992 but that they might at some time during the next five years is dishonest.

The Government claim that their promises were made sincerely in 1992. What of current Government commitments not to extend VAT to children's clothes, food or books? Are those commitments just as sincere as those made in 1992?

The impact of the Budget measures was mentioned by several of my hon. Friends. We have not yet been given a figure by the Government, but they could still cushion the impact of their actions on people receiving income support and pensions. They cannot, however, protect the low-paid who are just above income support levels and for whom fuel expenditure represents pay a higher than average percentage of their income. Those same people must, on average, pay out a higher percentage of their incomes because of the national insurance increases. They, not the higher-paid, will suffer. The Government have offered those in low-paid employment a real double whammy.

I personally welcome the changes in mortgage tax relief. I do not consider the mortgage tax relief scheme defensible; I have held that view for many years. But why did not the Government use the money to introduce a benefit scheme for low-income earners with mortgages—people who are not only struggling to make their mortgage payments now, but, in many thousands of cases, facing the prospect of repossession? The Government could have used the savings resulting from the change in the mortgage tax relief system to introduce benefits to assist those whose earnings place them just above income support level.

What have the unemployed been offered? They have been offered no help and no hope. No help or hope has been offered to the 100-plus who are to lose their jobs at Whitbread in Sheffield, the 100-plus who will lose their jobs at Trebor Bassett and the 100-plus who will lose their jobs at Avesta Sheffield. All those job losses have been announced in the last few weeks.

What do we offer a 50-year-old ex-steel worker, made redundant up to 10 years ago, or a 25-year-old who has never had a job? Do we offer the possibility of one of 100,000 training places, when those people know, and we know, that there is no possibility of their getting a job at the end? That is not merely dishonest; it is immoral.

The Government could have done so much. They could have released the capital receipts that are still locked up in local authority coffers; they could have presented sensible proposals for the development of a proper transport infrastructure, rather than the shambles and the constant delays of the channel tunnel link and the fiasco of the Jubilee line extension.

When will the Government recognise that public investment must be in place before we can create a climate in which private investment can follow, instead of trying to cobble together deals that simply result in years of delay and no action on the ground? All that the Government appear to offer the unemployed is protection from the Labour party and the social chapter. That is a real bargain basement offer: "no pay or low pay" seems to be their policy.

The whole Budget seems to have been motivated by faith—the belief that the recession will end, some time, somehow. In imposing VAT on fuel, the Government have admitted that they got it wrong: they thought that recovery was coming 12 months ago, but it did not materialise; hence the increase in the public sector borrowing requirement. Their economic approach is almost equivalent to the national health service abandoning medical science in favour of faith healing. Behind the facade of the "seven wise men" arguing away, we can almost see Treasury Ministers and their civil servants in a room in No. 11 Downing street—on their knees, eyes closed, holding their hands in front of them, willing the green shoots to appear. There seems to be no more substance than that to Government medium-term strategy.

Every so often, a cry of joy will be heard as unemployment falls for a month—although every serious commentator recognises that that is merely a blip. Cries of delight will be heard when industrial production goes up in one month, but the fact that the far more important three-month average has not shifted will not be recognised. Retail sales have risen since Christmas, but, year on year, they are still down in real terms. Housing activity is increasing slightly, but the scale of the depression has been so great that that increase will not feed into the construction industry for a long time, and the Government are offering the industry no real assistance.

The Government are willing recovery to occur, but what will happen if it does not? What will happen if it is delayed for another year—delayed until the tax increases begin to bite? Where in the Budget is the recognition that recovery is not certain, and that the timing is problematic? Where do we read of the consequences of the Government's getting it wrong, and—as they did 12 months ago—predicting a recovery that does not happen?

Let us turn to the long-term problems. Where is Government policy in that regard? Since 1979, unemployment, manufacturing investment and the balance of payments have worsened. The Government's problem with the economy is not cyclical; it is a fundamental, structural problem. The 1980s were a decade of private consumption and borrowing, which created personal debt. The Government should be turning the 1990s into a decade of investment in manufacturing and infrastructure, but there are no signs that they are doing so.

The Government's dilemma—the PSBR is rising to record levels, while unemployment is doing the same—is a product of the real weakness of the British economy: the inherent failure of our manufacturing industry, its collapse in the 1980s, the loss of a third of manufacturing jobs and the dereliction and destruction of areas such as the lower Don valley in Sheffield, where 50,000 jobs were lost during that decade. The same fundamental problems have brought about our balance of payments crisis at the depth of the longest recession that the country has experienced since the war.

The one thing for which the Government can claim some credit, in their terms, is getting inflation down; but we must ask whether they have solved even that problem. They have brought inflation down to below 4 per cent., but that was at the depth of a recession; they have never managed to achieve the same result at any of the peaks of economic activity since 1979, although each of those peaks has coincided with a higher level of unemployment than the previous one. That is the scale of the problem that the Government not only face—as we do—but have created, and for which they will not accept responsibility.

The Budget does not recognise the existence of such problems. It does not attempt to solve the long-term difficulties of financing British industry, and the relationship between banks and manufacturing industry, which clearly is not working; it makes no attempt to deal with the long-term problems of financing and offering equity capital to small firms, and the skills gap that affects the whole of industry; and it does not try to stimulate research and development to secure long-term recovery. None of those issues is mentioned.

On all counts, the Budget has failed. It has failed the whole nation with its broken promises. It has failed the unemployed by offering them nothing; it has failed to give a clear direction on medium-term strategy, offering faith and hope as a substitute; and it has failed to recognise the inherent structural failings of the economy, or to provide any policies to deal with those failings. It is a failed Budget from a failed Government.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): That was a merry speech.

I do not know whether the 10-minute rule will apply to me, as I am the last Conservative Back Bencher who will speak this evening; hon. Members on both sides of the House may wish to hear a little more from the Conservative party, and I am happy to speak for a little longer. The 10-minute rule means that hon. Members cannot mention all the speeches that they have heard, although I know that they will be mentioned in the winding-up speeches. Some interesting speeches have been made—for instance, the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who always speaks so brilliantly that his tour de force must be read very carefully if the reader is to understand all the finer points. I am sure that the House will wish to return to that subject.

In the nine minutes available to me, I want to speak about the Budget's interesting proposals for small businesses. Unlike its predecessors, which have tended to introduce fiscal measures of one kind or another, this Budget recognises that the administrative arrangements for small businesses are often equally important. It is no good giving companies tax breaks if there are so many rules and regulations that they are prevented from being profitable. I welcome the introduction of self-assessment for income tax purposes, the fact that self-employed people will pay tax based on current and not preceding year' estimates, and the fact that companies that are not incorporated will not be required to have a statutory audit.

The Budget, however, must be seen in the context of other initiatives to help small firms. The Government have abolished 5,000 business forms and 10,000 others. What did those forms do? How can the Government simply get rid of 5,000 forms? What were they all produced for, and what is the result of losing them? Why were they put there in the first place? What have we lost by taking them away? Will the number of civil servants and bureaucrats be reduced?

Does bureacracy in this country increase in direct proportion to the number of rules and regulations that are abolished? Is there a new Parkinson's law whereby the more things we get rid of, the more staff employed increase? The Palace of Westminster is a good example. I have my office in one of the outbuildings, where a very expensive security system has been installed. The door opens only after a card has been inserted. Before this high security system was installed, there were no security guards. Now, with the system, there are two full-time security officers as well as a very expensive security system. There seem to be more and more opportunities to duplicate our staff as well as our technology.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): And the doors often do not work.

Mr. Steen: That is perfectly true, but that is another matter.

Since 1957, the rate of introduction of Government rules and regulations has increased steadily. The trend has accelerated during the past six years. This most recent trend has been caused by the Government's practice of introducing new rules and regulations—statutory instruments—under ministerial powers, following primary enabling legislation. In 1992, the Government introduced 2,439 statutory instruments. It is not surprising that, in the same year, 24,424 companies became insolvent. It was not just the recession; it was the impact of the plethora of rules and regulations on enterprise. Many of the rules and regulations emanate from this place, as well as Europe.

Each set of regulations develops a life force of its own. As it spins into orbit, it attracts lots of people around it. It is self-generating; it attracts more and more officials as it spins off into space. Officials will fight to the death to keep each regulation in place. Every time we introduce a regulation, either in this House or in Europe, we also introduce a new bureaucracy to service that regulation. Far too much stick and not enough carrot is given to companies to implement the rules and regulations.

The Prime Minister has already said that he intends to do something about reversing that trend, but the buck starts and stops in Westminster. Just as central Government are trying to make local government more cost effective, so we need to apply the same rules to ourselves. I wonder whether machinery exists in the House to deal with central Government Departments that are churning out rules and regulations. Some hon. Members may say that the advantage of the Mastricht debate is that it is preventing the Government from introducing more and more rules and regulations.

I welcome both the Prime Minister's and the Government's intention, but we have to translate their belief into freeing up enterprise and reducing the amount of bureaucracy and the number of rules and regulations imposed on small businesses.

What is the problem? By privatising companies, we have produced two organisations: first, the provider of the service; secondly, the regulator. That has led to a new scenario. Water authorities used to provide both water and water services. They also used to be the gamekeeper. Today, the job of water authorities is to provide clean water and to free the sea from pollution. The job of the National Rivers Authority—the gamekeeper—is to scrutinise the work of the water authorities and to prosecute them if they do not comply. It is rather like a man with the stick chasing a dog.

The reason for the introduction of more and more rules and regulations and for their application with such ferocity and enthusiasm is because those two functions have been separated. We have not dealt with the effect of the introduction of the regulator.

The Audit Commission is breathing down the necks of local authorities. It spends most of its time pressing local authorities to increase their standards of performance. Some standards incur the more rigorous application of statutory duties and regulatory enforcement. Consequently, enforcement officers are more zealous when faced with target enforcement standards. It is the classic mistake of using input rather than output measurement —an increase in efficiency but not effectiveness. In general, the Audit Commission adopts a regulatory approach. That is a fundamental error, as there are other ways of encouraging British management and industry to comply.

The problem with negative enforcement is that it has resulted in a new approach that accepts accountability for compliance, with health, hygiene and safety standards, but oblivious to the current economic position. Rules and regulations shall be brought into force only when the nation can afford to do so.

How are we now to proceed? First, there are 70,000 rules and regulations on the books. We cannot repeal many of them. Furthermore, all these officials are implementing the rules and regulations. They would not give up their jobs lightly.

Secondly, we could starve the enforcement agencies, such as the National Rivers Authority or the local authorities so that they no longer had the money or the bureaucracy to enforce the regulations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might find that approach attractive. He could save a lot of money by not providing resources to the enforcement agencies.

Thirdly, we could slow down the enforcement of the rules and regulations. We ought not to be the first of all the European Community countries to enforce the regulations. We should not necessarily be among the slowest, such as Greece and Portugal, but we should slow down the pace of enforcement. That would be extremely helpful.

Lastly, a new civil service culture is needed. That may be the result of the scrutiny team's recommendations. An announcement was made earlier this month that a team would be set up, and 500 small firms would be asked to tell the Government what should be done about the regulations from which they suffer.

Last year, red tape killed nearly 25,000 companies. Although I welcome the Prime Minister's initiative, I am concerned about how it will be translated into action. We shall be unable to compete with the rest of Europe so long as we smother business with rules and regulations which——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

8.46 pm

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): I appreciate being called to speak in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, having been absent for so much of it. However, I heard the President of the Board of Trade's speech this afternoon, and it was like a trip down memory lane. He referred to the dissatisfaction of the Conservatives with what they inherited when they took office in 1979. I am surprised that he did not go back to 1924 and castigate Ramsay Macdonald, or to 1945 and castigate Clement Attlee. What has to be realised, above all, is that the Government have been in power for so long that they cannot castigate anybody else for what has happened. They have been in power for over half a generation.

My constituency is very depressed. The Budget has given no encouragement to many of my constituents. Nevertheless, I welcome three things. I welcome the fact that mortgage interest relief is to be reduced. I have long believed that property prices have been kept artificially high for many years because of mortgage interest relief. It would be a good thing if it were abolished altogether, although I realise that that will take time. I am also very pleased about the abolition of stamp duty on premises that are sold for less than £60,000. That will be very good for first-time buyers who are short of money.

Most important of all, I am pleased not so much by what is in the Budget as by what was left out of it, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a playful reference to it. He told us that there is to be no imposition of VAT at this time on reading material. I very much welcome that announcement.

We must view the Budget in the context of what has been happening in the past 14 years. It is an ironic coincidence that the Library issued a very good publication earlier this month. It could not have come at a better time. Research paper 92/93, entitled "The Burden of Taxation", points out that, since 1979, those who have been on above-average earnings have gained at the expense of those on below-average earnings. I recommend that Conservative Members read the document instead of trying to mislead the public by telling them otherwise. It is now possible for a person earning 150 per cent. of average earnings to pay a smaller proportion of his earnings in direct taxation than a person on average earnings.

Every hon. Member is well aware that indirect taxation, such as VAT, bears more heavily on the poor. I wish to comment especially on the proposed imposition of VAT on domestic fuel at 8 per cent. next year and at 17·5 per cent. in 1995. Hon. Members, and especially Ministers, probably will not notice the increase in their fuel bills. It is fine for them to say that it is a good system, but they have clearly not considered the low-paid. I am not talking only about poor pensioners. Many pensioners have small pensions in addition to their state pensions, which takes them above the income support level. They will be hit especially hard, but 12 million people live below the European decency threshold, and they will be hit even harder.

It does not take much understanding to realise that many people whose incomes are not very high—perhaps both partners are having to work to give their children a reasonable standard of living—often live in premises that are not very well insulated. They do not always have a choice of fuel, and matters have not been helped by the fact that many councils have not been able to bring properties up to the required standard, because of a lack of cash. It is an indictment of the Government that they should consider a fuel tax when there is already so much fuel poverty. It is no exaggeration to say that, every year, people perish from hypothermia, largely because of the cost of fuel but also because many premises are not up to standard.

I always remember a good comrade of mine saying many years ago that one can always judge a society by the way it treats its very old and very young. Just as many pensioners will suffer from this pernicious taxation, so many young people will also suffer. It does not bear thinking about.

One of the most annoying aspects about the proposal is that, during the so-called boom years, many of those on above-average incomes did very well, and it seems only right and proper that, when the country runs into more stormy times, they should be expected to pay a little more, not less. Once again, the Government have shown just what sort of Government they are, how unfair and unjust, and how little respect they have for those who create the wealth, who are not necessarily those on high pay—indeed, I suggest, just the opposite.

It must also be said that the fuel tax will affect charities. It is worth bearing in mind that, because of the failure of so many of the Government's social policies, more pressure is being put on charities. Charities will not be able to claim back the extra VAT that they will have to pay on fuel, and they will also suffer a loss of income tax relief on their investments.

I may not know as much about finances as most Conservative Members, but I have been involved with charities. I know how they work, and I know that there often is a very thin line between them continuing to exist and having to wind up. I am very much afraid that the imposition of VAT will cause charities to suffer badly, especially those charities looking after old people, which will have to bear a disproportionate burden because of heating costs.

There has been a tremendous amount of hypocrisy about the green effect of the proposal, and about our having to meet emission standards. If this country were sincere about meeting those standards, we would be spending money to ensure that all properties were properly insulated; we would be doing something about transferring freight and passengers from road to rail; and we would be investing in tram systems to take buses off the road. We would also be interested in combined heat and power schemes as an alternative to the seedy system of so-called competition in the electricity generation and distribution industries, which, in addition to being monopolistic, have a vested interest against the efficient use of energy. Only when such measures are contemplated will I begin to believe that the Government are sincere in trying to meet their obligation to do something about emissions.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I did not expect to have the pleasure of participating in this debate, but I am glad to do so, if only briefly.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on an extremely innovative and thoughtful Budget. I am especially glad to be able to do that, as he is a very old friend of mine, and it is good to see him produce a Budget which will be something of a landmark Budget. He has been especially helpful to small businesses and, in spite of what the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) said, he has done a great deal for charities, not only in this Budget but in a series of Budgets.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend has come into the Chamber. I wish to appeal to him on the subject that has occupied many of the headlines in the past few days—his understandable but controversial decision to impose value added tax on domestic fuel. I understand what prompted him to do it, and I appreciate that there must have been a great deal of mental wrestling in deciding where revenue was to be raised. Of course, many of us would have been up in arms had he put VAT on books and newspapers. Whatever he had decided to do, he would undoubtedly have been the target for some criticism.

However, I ask my right hon. Friend to think very carefully in the year ahead. We have a year before any VAT is imposed on domestic fuel. It will first be imposed at 8 per cent., and will not reach its 17·5 per cent. level for two years. My right hon. Friend is well aware, as we all are, of the particular plight of the elderly. I worry very much about how many of them will be able to cope with a rate of 17·5 per cent. We have had assurances from the Prime Minister and others, for which we are grateful, that something will be done to compensate, but it has not been spelt out carefully or clearly enough. We want to know the full details as soon as possible.

I am confident that something will be done adequately to compensate those who are on benefit, but I point out that many elderly people do not qualify for benefit—through their thrift and frugality they have been able to look after themselves, and they take great pride in that. It is on them that the burden will fall with especial and peculiar severity.

I suggest to my right hon. Friend that there is a good solution. I have felt for a long time that there is a case for two-tier VAT. If my right hon. Friend puts 8 per cent. on domestic fuel next year, he should leave it at that. He should not raise the figure to 17·5 per cent. in the subsequent year. If the rate remains at 8 per cent., it will be far easier to cope with in terms of the increase in benefits. It will also be easier for those who do not have recourse to benefits to budget for the increase.

My right hon. Friend could also set a useful precedent. I fully agree with him that it is a fundamental belief of our party that we should increase indirect rather than direct taxation. However, many people feel that 17·5 per cent., on whatever it is levied, is a high level of VAT. It is certainly a high level on fuel, one of the basic necessities of life. I completely comprehend the green argument, and I was interested to receive from Friends of the Earth a paean of praise for the courage of my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Surely not.

Mr. Cormack: One can echo that to a degreee. Friends of the Earth are not always right.

In congratulating my right hon. Friend on what he has done and in thanking him for producing a far-reaching and innovative Budget, I say to him as a very old friend, "Please think again about VAT at 17·5 per cent. on domestic fuel, especially as it affects our elderly citizens."

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): I welcome the comments of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). The way in which he, on behalf of his constituents, can get the Chancellor to think again about imposing VAT at 17·5 per cent. on gas and on electricity is to join us in the Lobby tonight and to vote against that proposal.

This is a Budget of betrayal and of failure. It betrays the hope of the unemployed and it fails to set the economy on course for growth and investment. It puts up everyone's taxes to pay for the Tories' economic mistakes and it is unfair. Those who will pay most are those who can least afford it.

The Tories' election promises on public services are now also threatened by spending cuts. The Tory manifesto promised that health spending would be increased year on year, that there would be more police on the beat, that there would be more nurseries and more help for students, and that pensions and child benefit levels would be protected. Yet it is to consider precisely those areas that the Chief Secretary is now to preside over a review of the Department of Health, of the Department for Education, of the Department of Social Security and of the Home Office. If the Tories can break their promises on taxation, how much easier they will find it to break their promises to defend a welfare state which few of their families use and which many of them despise.

The Budget not only threatens vital services and fails to set the economy on course for jobs, for investment and for growth—it breaks the Tories' central election pledge to reduce taxes. The economy needed a Budget for jobs and for economic recovery. We should have had a Budget to break out of the vicious circle of unemployment, of waste and of decline. We should have had a Budget which forged a new cycle of skills, of productivity and of growth.

In the past 14 years, manufacturing has grown by 50 per cent. in Japan and by 25 per cent. in America, but in Britain it has barely grown at all. We are falling behind on investment. The German industrial worker is backed by an average of £4,000 capital investment. The Japanese worker is backed by an average of £6,000. The British worker has only £2,500 capital investment behind him.

We are also behind on skills. West Germany, Japan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Taiwan and South Korea have more of their young people at college and in further education than is the case in Britain. The competitive edge of an economy will be the skills of its people, so falling behind on skills and leaving people unemployed is not only a waste of people's individual talent and potential—it means that we shall fall further behind as economies compete in future.

We are also behind on research and development. Japan sees eight times as much of its profits ploughed back into research and development as we do. The fragile state of our manufacturing industry was revealed in the Sunday Times leak of the Department of Trade and Industry report, which the Government still refuse to publish—indeed, they still deny the facts that were clearly set out in it.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): Does my hon. Friend agree that we get a lot of lectures from Conservative Members about the success of Japanese companies investing in the United Kingdom but that they rarely mention the fact that, threatened by recession, the Japanese Government have invested £40 billion to try to ensure that Japan remains competitive? Why are the British Government not trying to do the same?

Ms Harman: I agree with my hon. Friend. Japan and the United States are investing and the EC wants to invest; the British Government alone, it seems, are blind to the lack of investment in our economy and try to tell us that everything is perfectly fine.

Mr. Nicholls: As the hon. Lady applauds a Government investment of £40 billion, will she now tell us what she thinks the public sector borrowing requirement should be?

Ms Harman: The high level of the PSBR is the result of high unemployment and a failure in our economy. What we would do is to bring down unemployment, introduce a proper strategy for industry and growth and bring down the PSBR. The PSBR is too high as a result of the failure of this Government's economic policy and particularly as a result of their allowing unemployment simply to grow.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): The hon. Lady blames the Government for unemployment. Is it not a fact that every Labour Government who have ever been in power have left unemployment higher than when they came to power?

Ms Harman: Unemployment has more than doubled since 1979. It increased by 61 per cent. between December 1990 and December 1992. We have the highest rate of increase in unemployment in the European Community.

The Tories' economic judgment has been wrong throughout. They have been wrong about the fact of the economy going into recession. They have been wrong about the impact of the recession—particularly on our beleaguered manufacturing industry. They have been wrong about the length of the recession and they have been wrong about the depth of the recession. In 1989, the Prime Minister—then the Chancellor—said:

"I do not believe that a recession is likely".

In September 1990, in true King Canute style, he said:

"We are not in recession".

As soon as the Tories acknowledged that Britain was in recession, they began predicting the end of the recession. In December 1990, the Chancellor told the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service that the recession would be "relatively short-lived and relatively shallow."

Now, as unemployment remains at more than 3 million, with predictions in the Budget statement that 200,000 more people will lose their jobs by the end of this year, and when the prospect ahead is a yawning trade gap, we are told that we have had a five-star week for the economy.

[Ms Harman]

The Government have repeatedly had to revise their figures on the economy as, time and again, predictions of growth have been too high and predictions of national debt too low. While the Chancellor has become famous as the star of the movie, "Honey, I Shrunk the Economy", the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is now breaking box office records with the sequel, "Honey, I Blew Up the PSBR".

The human cost of unemployment is painfully high, with families and communities around the country blighted, but unemployment is also taking its toll on the public purse. It costs the taxpayer £9,000 per unemployed person per year in benefits paid out and lost tax revenue. The annual bill for keeping 3 million people who want to work unemployed is £270 billion a year. No wonder public finances are in a mess.

While unemployment has risen, training programmes have been cut and the Budget offers extra help to only half the people who are expected to lose their jobs by the end of this year. The net new money that the Government have agreed for schemes to help the unemployed—schemes which were trumpeted before the Budget—simply has not materialised. The figure is only £125 million. Since 1987, the Government have cut £1·5 billion in real terms from spending on training and help for the unemployed. As unemployment has increased, the Government are hardly creeping back to the situation which existed before the cuts.

Businesses have gone to the wall. There were 63,000 insolvencies this year, an increase of 31 per cent. since 1991. Against that background, the Department of Trade and Industry has suffered cuts. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) explained, the Budget does nothing for business. In fact, it anticipates a fall in business investment this year. It anticipates that there will be £400 million less invested in business this year than was invested last year.

The President of the Board of Trade referred to a survey by the Institute of Directors as optimistic; yet that survey shows that half its members plan no investment this year. We would not be in this situation if the Government had taken the action that Labour has urged. Unless there is increased investment in capacity, skills and technology, British industry simply cannot recapture the markets that have been lost at home and abroad.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Lady talks about our losing markets at home. Will she bear in mind the fact that, as a result of the social chapter, we are actually gaining markets from overseas countries?

Ms Harman: Countries in the rest of the European Community which believe that it is important to have high-skill, high-wage, high-tech economies are going ahead of us. There is no future for our economy if it is a low-wage, low-skill economy competing with under-developed countries.

Unless British industry is competitive, the trade deficit will grow and there will be no hope of a sustainable reduction in the PSBR. Raising taxes without tackling unemployment and industrial decline merely deals with the consequences of the economic problems we face. It does not deal with the causes.

The Government have not suffered from a shortage of public money. They received £115 billion in revenue from North sea oil and £62 billion in privatisation receipts, but that has all been frittered away. If the Government are hemmed in now—as they are—it is not as a result of lack of public money in the past. Rather, it is the result of a complete absence of ideas for the future. While our competitors invested, the Tories gave tax handouts to the rich. They were also content to see more and more millions paid out in benefits for the growing dole queue which they believed was a price worth paying. They have broken their promises, increased taxes and failed on the economy.

In this Budget, the Government have sought to remedy the soaring public debt by raising taxes. Public debt is soaring as a result of the Government's mismanagement of the economy. The high level of public borrowing is a consequence of their economic failure, not a cause of it. This is a Budget in which everyone else has to pay for the Tories' mistakes. However, they still have not learnt from those mistakes.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) said, this is a Budget of yet more broken promises. Before the election, the Chancellor said:

"We will not have to increase taxes."

He went further and said:

"I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

Before the election, the Prime Minister said:

"We have no plans to increase value added tax."

Indeed, he went further than that and said:

"There will be no VAT increase."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

and he repeated:

"We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): As the hon. Lady finds it so unpleasant to raise taxes, will Labour now give a definite pledge to revoke the VAT—[Interruption.]

Ms Harman: Could the hon. Gentleman repeat his question? His hon. Friends were shouting and I could not hear him.

Dr. Fox: I am glad to give the hon. Lady more time to think about my question. We have had a lot of confusion from Labour Members in the past week about whether a Labour Government would revoke the VAT on fuels. Can the hon. Lady clear up the confusion and give the House and the country a clear answer—would a Labour Government revoke the imposition of VAT on fuels?

Ms Harman: The question before the House tonight is whether those Conservative Members who promised their constituents that they would not increase VAT and extend its scope will vote against the VAT increase. During the election campaign the Prime Minister said:

"We have no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT."

Labour Members will vote against the measure tonight to make the Government keep their election promises.

The Prime Minister also said:

"I have no plans to raise the top rate of tax or the level of national insurance contributions."

In the first Budget after the election, the Government have increased taxes and national insurance contributions and put VAT on gas and electricity. It is hard to overstate the cynicism and betrayal that that represents.

The pledges on VAT and national insurance were not side issues: they were the centrepiece of the Conservative election campaign to cut taxes. It was put precisely by the President of the Board of Trade in a Conservative election release of 21 March 1992:

"This election in the first week is about tax, in the second week is about tax and in the third week is about tax."

Following the re-election of the Conservatives, we know that the first year is about tax, the second year is about tax and the third year is about tax.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): The hon. Lady and her party will vote against taxes, especially the tax on domestic fuels. Can she now tell us whether a Labour Government would repeal it?

Ms Harman: I have made it absolutely clear that we shall be voting against the imposition of VAT on gas and domestic fuel. We shall not support the Government in breaking their promise—and if the hon. Gentleman had any conscience and sense of accountability to his constituents, neither would he. [Interruption.]

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I cannot hear whether a Labour Government would repeal the imposition of VAT or not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The noise seems to be coming from both sides of the House.

Ms Harman: If 11 Conservative Members voted against the measure, it would be defeated. I hope that that will happen tonight.

The pledges were echoed in speeches and Tory political broadcasts nightly: "You can trust the Tories—they won't put up your taxes." No one can be in any doubt now—the Government have put up taxes and they can never be trusted again.

Last week the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) boasted that the Chancellor had sought his views. If ever we were in any doubt about the Chancellor's judgment, there is the evidence. The hon. Gentleman told us:

"The only thing I asked my right hon. Friend"—

the Chancellor—

"to do was tax, tax hard, tax heavily and tax as soon as possible."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 317.]

That is not what he told his constituents when he asked for their votes less than a year ago. I shall give him the opportunity to remind the House what he told his constituents before I quote from the election special in the Evening Telegraph.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): The hon. Lady should be aware that, since 1979, I have always told my constituents that, when it comes to a public sector borrowing requirement, we will have none of it.

Ms Harman: Curiously enough, I find it difficult to reconcile that with what the hon. Gentleman said in the Grimsby Evening Telegraph in the election special headed "The Last Words". The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, seeking election, said:

"Only a Conservative Government can continue the process of empowering the people with lower taxation."

Not only have the Government broken their election promises, but they are hitting the poor hardest. When money is to be given away, the Tories give it to the richest. When money is to be taken, they take it back from the poorest. Chancellor Lawson gave £6 billion to the richest in 1988, and £6 billion is to be taken back in 1993 by the present Chancellor from everyone. The department of applied economics at Cambridge has calculated that all households will eventually be hit, but the full implementation of the measures over the next three years will cost the poorest tenth twice as much as the wealthiest tenth.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): When Labour presented its Budget for jobs—eight pages of A3—why were the only proposals for taxation a tax on water, a tax on gas, a tax on electricity and a tax on telephones? Why is Labour's so-called windfall tax, which would have hit both industry and the poor, good for Labour while the tax which has been introduced by the Conservatives, which will protect the poor, is somehow flawed?

Ms Harman: That neatly illustrates the difference between Labour and the Government. We suggested using the accumulated profits. That would have had no impact on the ordinary consumer whereas the Government tax ordinary people, including pensioners and the low-paid, in order to protect the vested interests of their friends whom they put on the boards of the privatised utilities.

Taken together, the Budget's proposals for 1p on national insurance contributions, 17·5 per cent. VAT on fuel, a real cut of 2·6 per cent. in tax-free allowances, the limiting of the married couple's allowance to relief at 20 per cent. and the reduction of mortgage tax relief to 20 per cent., impose a tax increase on all households. Most will lose about 2 per cent. of their income in extra tax under the measures in the Budget, but on average the 10 per cent. of households with the highest incomes will lose less than 1·5 per cent. of their income while those with the lowest 10 per cent. of income will lose twice that and 3 per cent. extra of their income will go in tax.

The increase in tax will begin in April this year when 200,000 people who currently do not earn enough to pay tax start to pay it for the first time. Not only has the Chancellor increased taxes, but those least able to pay will pay most and those most able to pay will pay least. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) said, the 1p increase on national insurance will mean that half a million people who do not earn enough to pay income tax will have to pay an extra 1p in the pound.

The Financial Secretary owned up on the ITN "Talking Points" programme on Wednesday when he explained to us why the richest must pay least. He said:

"We mustn't kill the goose that lays the golden egg."

That is the discredited trickle-down theory of economics. But while trying to protect the geese which at some future date may lay some golden eggs, the Chancellor has refused to answer the concern that the poorest will be hit by the increase in their fuel bills.

Let us examine what Ministers have said about compensation for pensioners and people on low incomes. There has been Government confusion before breakfast, before lunch and before dinner. The next day we get up and the Government are in confusion again. On Tuesday the Chancellor said that he would take the VAT rise into account. On Wednesday the Chief Secretary said that it was all a matter of swings and roundabouts. On Thursday the junior Social Security Minister said that the rise was nothing special and not out of the ordinary. By lunch on Thursday, the Social Security Minister said that extra help would be provided. On Sunday, the Chancellor ruled out full compensation as too expensive and too complicated.

So what is the Government's position? We know that that they have to compensate people for the rise in retail prices. They must give us a commitment tonight that they will compensate pensioners and people on low incomes in full for the rise in value added tax. Pensioners and families on low incomes spend £1 in every £7 on fuel. The average bill is £12 per week, so for many people VAT will mean up to £2 more per week on their fuel bill. Will the Chancellor compensate them in full? Will he not just say that there are swings and roundabouts, but compensate in full? Will he not just dismiss it as nothing special, but compensate in full? Will he not just give extra help, but compensate in full?

The Government went to the electorate with a commitment. They did not say that they had no plans to raise VAT; they said that they would not raise it. When they went to the electorate, they did not say that they might not raise VAT; they said that there were no circumstances in which they would raise it.

Mr. Forman: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: No, I have given way at least eight times and I shall not do so again.

If Conservative Members vote with the Government this evening they, too, will be guilty of breaking their election promises and no one will trust them again. Having said that they would not put VAT on fuel, they did so. Having said that there will be compensation, they are refusing to say how much. How can people trust them? The Government expect the House to vote for tax measures that we know will hit the poorest, but they have given no details of the compensation scheme. I suppose that we are expected simply to take them on trust.

Mr. Forman rose——

Ms Harman: I shall not give way.

Mr. Forman rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has made it clear that she is not giving way.

Ms Harman: Last Wednesday, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury explained to the House how those promises came to be broken. He said that the Government had not intended to put up VAT, or to increase national insurance contributions. After the election, no one was more surprised than the Government to discover that the recession went from bad to worse—for reasons which were quite out of their control, of course. So the Government put VAT on gas and electricity and increased national insurance contributions, and the Chancellor told us that that was the plain truth. What are we to make of that?

The Chancellor also blamed circumstances beyond his control for the state of the economy in an interview with The Independent on Sunday on 14 March, when he said: "what I think happened last year was that the situation deteriorated very much internationally".

But the Treasury forecast for the economy cannot have been blown off course because in the 1992 Budget forecast just about the only prediction that the Government got right was about the world economy. Either their judgment about the economy was disastrously wrong, or they were practising the politics of deception, or they made those promises without bothering much whether they would be in a position to honour them.

They used to say that George Washington could not tell a lie and that Richard Nixon could not tell the truth. Our Prime Minister cannot tell the difference. Under this Government, it is not merely the pound that has been devalued, but democracy itself.

If the Government's economic judgment was so disastrously wrong, why should the British people ever trust them again? They stand condemned not only for an unforgivable lack of foresight, but because they did not have the wit to listen to people who were warning them about the true state of the economy. Did they engage in deception, or did they fail to understand what was happening in the economy? The answer probably lies somewhere in between the two. The Government have such contempt for the electorate that they did not care whether they would be in a position to stand by their promises, just so long as they got in again.

There does not appear to be any sign of anguish on the Government Bench—no sign of regret for breaking their promises. The brows of the Chancellor and of the Chief Secretary remain unfurrowed. In fact, they have both been smirking their way through these debates and through radio and television studios. They think that they have pulled a fast one on the electorate and that they will be able to get away with it. It is the true sign of a party that has been in government too long when it sees the democratic process as nothing more than something to be manipulated to secure one more term of office. The British people will not be treated with such arrogance and contempt, and the party that did it will never stop paying the price.

I suggest to Tory Members, particularly those on the Back Benches, that if they have a conscience, now is the time that they should examine it. Tory Members have a choice tonight: what we have before us is an election fraud, and they can either go along with it or reject it. They can either follow discredited Ministers through the Lobby, or they can keep the promises that they made to their constituents and vote with us against the Budget.

9.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont): This is the fourth day of the Budget debate. Inevitably, I have been unable to listen to all the speeches, but I have read the Hansard reports of all the speeches that have been made hitherto.

Almost everyone has acknowledged that the Budget was framed against exceptionally difficult circumstances. That was the theme of the speeches made by my hon. Friends the Members for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox). I have had to make some very difficult decisions and face up to some very unpalatable choices. We know that the Labour party can never face up to difficult decisions.

Above all, in framing my Budget, I believe that I had to do two things. First, I had to ensure that nothing should damage recovery this year. Secondly, I had to address the problem of mounting Government debt to ensure that the nation's finances are put on a sound footing for the future.

I have no doubt that, unless Government borrowing is kept under firm control, it will be the biggest threat to sustained recovery in the 1990s. That was the theme of the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), and for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who made a powerful speech—one which his predecessor, Lord Ridley, whom we remember with affection, would have agreed strongly with and commended.

Beyond those two specific objectives, I also wanted to show the country that the Government have a clear strategy for getting Britain back on the road to sound finance. As I said, that is the way in which to sustain recovery. That is the lead for which I believe the country was looking, and it was given in the Budget.

I have spelt out the tax and revenue plans not just for one year, but for three. With public spending ceilings now firmly established for the years ahead, I have laid down a medium-term fiscal strategy to match our medium-term financial strategy. I have made it clear that the strategy should be legislated for as far as possible in this year's Finance Bill so that it should carry credibility with the markets.

The result of my measures will be to reduce borrowing over the years by up to 1·5 per cent. of GDP and to cut the deficit by more than half in the next five years. Difficult decisions are involved, but those reductions represent a considerable step towards addressing the problem that must be addressed today.

In the year ahead, I have been able to give extra help to industry, so strengthening the recovery in its early stages. The Budget contained a huge variety of measures to help business in the short-term. First, there are measures to help the self-employed and small businesses, which have played such a crucial role in the past in the British economy and which can, again, lead us out of recession in the 1990s.

I doubt whether there has even been a Budget that has contained such a wide range of deregulatory measures that will sweep away so much of bureaucracy and red tape, which are extremely aggravating to, and time-consuming for, so many small businesses. I know from the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) that that is of particular interest to him.

There are proposals to lessen the burden of the statutory audit. I am also making far-reaching changes to the VAT penalty regime—moving from a regime of automatic penalties to one that is more discretionary. I know that those changes will relieve much of the burden and many of the anxieties felt by many small business men. The changes have been widely welcomed by the organisations for small businesses.

I have proposed to introduce self-assessment for up to one third of all taxpayers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) was worried that some people might find that difficult, but there is a choice. There is no compulsion over the matter. However, I believe that many people will find it an attractive option. It goes together with the drastic simplification of the taxation of the self-employed that I announced at the same time. Taken together, those proposals represent the most fundamental reform to the administration of tax since the pay-as-you-earn system was introduced in 1944.

I announced proposals for extending and improving the loan guarantee system in a way to give an added incentive to fixed-rate borrowing, of which there is too little in this country. Over future years, it could give stability and security for small businesses.

Those measures add up to formidable package of help for small businesses. It was welcomed by my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls), who rightly called it a five-star Budget for small business. One might have thought that the Opposition would welcome at least one of the measures, but they did not welcome any of them.

I have introduced a range of measures to help larger British businesses. The first of those is a massive increase in the Export Credits Guarantee Department facilities for companies operating in the most important and fastest-growing markets around the world. As a result of what I announced on Budget day, British firms will be able to go out and compete knowing that they do so on equal terms with their competitors.

Secondly, I introduced measures to deal with the admittedly highly technical problem of advance corporation tax. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) said that he thought that he noticed some fluttering of the eyelids among hon. Members during that part of the Budget speech. That may be so, but, nevertheless, the proposals responded to great concern and were of great interest to some of the international businesses that operate in this country. The proposals will help to make Britain an even more attractive location for inward investment than it already is. I also took action over the uniform business rate to ensure that no business will face a real increase in rates this year. That will help 800,000 premises, many of them in the south, whose owners have given the move a warm welcome.

Finally, I made announcements about some private infrastructure projects, including the channel tunnel rail link. Those announcements have been widely welcomed; they followed on from the policy changes that I announced in the autumn statement. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said, they will enable this country to do what many other countries do: tap private savings in order to finance large infrastructure projects in cities and elsewhere.

Those are substantial measures. Therefore, it is little surprise that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) said, the Budget was warmly welcomed by organisations representing British industry and commerce. We heard a few quotations from Opposition Members who have tried to find the odd organisation here and there with critical views of the Budget. In a Budget that raised revenues by £6·5 billion and £10 billion, it would be surprising if somebody did not have something critical to say.

The list of organisations that have given a warm welcome to the Budget include the Confederation of British Industry, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, the Institute of Directors, the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, the Council of Mortgage Lenders, the Forum of Private Business and the Federation of Small Businesses. The chairmen and chief executives of many individual companies went on record as welcoming the Budget. They included GKN, GEC, Coats Viyella, Abbey National and BP. They are some of the most successful companies in the country, and they know that this Budget is good for them and good for business.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Will the right hon. Gentleman deal with a significant point that I have not heard mentioned so far? Value added tax is a tax on value added, obviously, for those who wish to buy goods. Why, then, did he use VAT on heating and fuel bills to hit poor people who need to use electricity anyway?

Mr. Lamont: Much of this debate has centred on that very point—my decision to extend VAT to domestic fuel and power. I fully recognise the concern felt about the effect that these proposals will have on poorer households, particularly those of poorer pensioners. That is why I clearly stated in my Budget speech that we fully intend to give extra help to those on income-related benefits, over and above the automatic impact on pensions and other benefits through the higher retail prices index. I wholly understand the anxiety of some households, but we have clearly said that we will bring forward the uprating of income-related benefits so that the extra help that we provide will be available at the time that it is needed—before the increased fuel bills arrive next spring.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East) rose——

Mr. Lamont: This party has an excellent record of helping the worst-off, not by keeping expensive, across-the-board subsidies, benefiting both rich and poor, but by doing what should be done in any modern welfare state: targeting the resources on the most needy and the worst off. That has been our priority. No Government have done more for poorer pensioners and families with children——

Mr. Brown: Will the Chancellor accept that he said during the election campaign that there would be no circumstances in which a VAT increase would be imposed? Will he give us a straightforward answer to a simple question? Will he compensate pensioners and others on low income in full—yes or no?

Mr. Lamont: I have explained exactly what we are doing, and I assure the House that it will be our intention to protect the poorest people in the country. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman can shout all he likes. We do not want to put poorer people in a position in which they cannot pay their fuel bills because of the changes. We have made it clear that we will adjust the income-related benefits. We have an excellent record on that, and since 1988 we have provided additional help for less well off pensioners and disabled people—help that will be worth about £700 million in real terms next year. We have continued to increase the income-related benefits even while average fuel charges have been falling, by more than 8 per cent. in real terms since 1986. There is still downward pressure on domestic electricity and gas bills.

Because of these reductions, my proposal to put VAT on fuel will not necessarily mean that prices rise by anything like 17·5 per cent. over the next three years. Those on income support will also be able to keep the additions made to their benefits to reflect their liability to pay 20 per cent. of the community charge, even though they will not be required to make any contribution to the council tax. That alone is worth £2·80 to a married couple and £1·60 to a single person from next month. That shows our commitment to looking after those who are worst off.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Why cannot the Chancellor give a straightforward answer to a simple question? Does he not understand that it is because he fails to do so that no one in the country trusts him? Will he compensate pensioners and others on low incomes in full—yes or no?

Mr. Lamont: I have answered the question. I will take no lectures from a party which, when in government, put up electricity bills by 30 per cent. in real terms. We know who the Minister at the Department of Energy was at the time. It was the Leader of the Opposition. That was what he did for poorer people then; what price his rhetoric now?

Mr. John Smith: The Chancellor has been asked a very simple and clear question—will he compensate pensioners in full? Why cannot he say yes or no?

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. and learned Gentleman, as always, cannot face up to the facts of his own record. I note that when he put forward his manifesto for the leadership of the Labour party, he even told us in his election address:

"We should . . . consider the increased use of the fiscal system to promote environmental protection and conservation."

According to the Opposition, the idea of VAT on fuel and power never crossed their minds; they never considered it. How strange it is then that, in their policy document "Looking to the Future", under the heading "Value Added Taxation", they say:

"Zero rating on items such as food, fares, books and children's clothing should remain."

But where, the country will want to know, was fuel and power—the zero rate that did not bark? I expect that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will tell us that it was a typing error. The trouble is that in the very next sentence the document says:

"we will look at ways of . . . increasing taxes on environmentally damaging products."

This Government went to the environmental conference in Rio, fought for a reasonable and achievable deal, and have taken steps to reach it. The Opposition have wrapped themselves in greenery and chanted incantations about global warming, yet they now oppose the very steps that we are taking to deal with that. They are the people whose word means absolutely nothing.

Mr. Morgan: The Chancellor cannot have it both ways. At one point he told us that the reason for the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel was the unexpectedly high increase in public sector borrowing subsequent to the election, of which he was wholly unaware at the time of the election. What he has just said directly contradicts that: he now says that the Rio summit is the reason. If my memory serves me right, the Rio summit was held before the election. Which is it?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong; the Rio summit was in June last year.

As always, the most important question asked in the debate was the one asked not by the Opposition, but by Conservative Members. It was the question posed by my right hon. Friends the Members for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling)—whether the action that I propose in the Budget is extensive enough and early enough to meet the objectives that I have set. That is the real question and it is precisely the most difficult and central matter on which I had to make a judgment.

I very much took the view taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), that we had to take account of the fact that confidence had been knocked hard by the length of the recession and that large tax increases too early would undermine recovery. Therefore, in my opinion, it was right not to raise taxes this year, but to go for a neutral Budget which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring said, would increase taxation as economic growth gets fully under way. I believe that to be a reasonable and appropriate reaction to the position that we face.

For those of us on the Conservative Benches, raising revenue is never a welcome task; it is something which we consider only when that is vital for the public finances. In this Budget, I had in mind two objectives in deciding how to raise revenue—first, that my particular tax measures should not hit particular sectors that would impede recovery; secondly, that the tax changes that I made should be sensible tax reforms in their own right. For that reason, I concentrated on tax measures that accord with the philosophy of this Government and of this party—that is, rather than increasing marginal tax rates, I concentrated on broadening the base of the tax system and on reducing the value of allowances.

Above all, I reconfirmed in many of my changes—particularly the reduction to 20 per cent. of certain allowances—our commitment as a Government to getting the basic rate of income tax down to 20p in the pound eventually. That remains our target and our objective.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) pointed out, raising revenue is just one side. We must look additionally at public spending, which must also be expected to take part of the strain. We made a start on that process in last year's autumn statement. The settlement that we achieved then shows that the growth of public spending will be under control, because the growth in the new control total is set to be below the trend growth in the economy as a whole. The long-term review of public spending under my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is designed to address the problem.

If we want to control public spending, we must continually re-examine each and every Department and function of government and question whether it is appropriate and necessary to continue with it today.

This Budget is genuinely addressed to meeting the problems of the country. It is not something which Labour would ever understand because it is a Budget designed to do what is right—not to curry favour or popularity. It is a Budget designed to give the country hope for the future, by giving a clear lead.

What has been Labour's reaction? In four days of debate, we have heard not one word of policy. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) seems to have made a conscious decision not to have a policy. He is the first shadow Chancellor to give an hour-long speech about the economy, as he did the other day, without ever mentioning monetary or fiscal policy.

In all the hon. Gentleman's outpourings, sound bites, new approaches, fresh starts, agendas for the 1990s and new beginnings, he has not told us whether he thinks that Government borrowing is too high, too low or just right. The hon. Gentleman cannot tell us whether taxes are too high or too low. In four days of debate, the hon. Gentleman has not produced one constructive suggestion.

Since the hon. Gentleman became shadow Chancellor he has, we are told, made two important speeches about the economy. One was about agriculture. It was an interesting speech, but the hon. Gentleman is certainly the first would-be finance Minister to talk more about the suckler cow premium than about narrow money.

What of the hon. Gentleman's right hon. and hon. Friends? The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) had just one suggestion. Replying to my Budget statement, he said that I should abolish Budget purdah. That certainly would not affect him very much, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not have any policies to hide.

All we heard from Labour in the debate was endless whining and harking back to the last general election. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East is the last person who should complain about the general election. He did not do badly out of it. First, he lost the election for his party with his own tax proposals—then had himself made party leader as compensation.

If Labour wants to talk about the last general election, let us talk about it—I am happy to do so. The Labour party, as always, needs to have its myths if it is to exist. We heard in the debate the myth that somehow Labour was cheated at the last general election. In 1992, as in 1979, the Conservative party was elected as the party of sound finance and of low taxation—particularly low direct taxation. In 1979 and in the two years thereafter, the needs of the times dictated a rise in taxes. That happened in 1979 and 1981, but once we had borrowing down, taxes and spending were steadily reduced as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. John Smith: Does the right hon. Gentleman remember saying, during a Channel 4 news broadcast—[Interruption.] I know that Conservative Members do not want to hear this. He said:

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

What meaning did the right hon. Gentleman wish to convey to his listeners then?

Mr. Lamont: I have explained, and explained fully. I believe that not to have addressed the problem of the budget deficit would have been to run away from the most fundamental promise that we made to the British people.

There is a real difference and distinction between the two parties, and it is one that cannot be fudged or obfuscated. In 1992—as was shown by the speeches of all Opposition Front Benchers—the Labour party was committed to massive increases in public spending, and high public spending means high taxes: the two go hand in hand. It is impossible to pretend otherwise; to seek to deny the connection is truly to deliberately deceive the British people.

Opposition Members should listen to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). He talks a lot more sense, especially after his lunches with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The other day, he said:

"I think the Labour party ought to accept that we will always be likely to have a higher tax burden than our opponents".

We know that, he knows that and so do the British people.

If the Labour party wants to know why it lost the last general election, let me explain. It was for two reasons. First, there was the disastrous shadow Budget introduced by the Leader of the Opposition. This is the difference between the tax increases that he proposed, and the tax increases in this Budget: he proposed tax increases to expand public spending. He was trying to bribe one part of the electorate with the other part's money. Moreover, he could not add up and discover that many people in the south earn more than £20,000 a year.

Secondly, Labour lost the election because the shadow Budget was not the whole story; it was the beginning of Labour's potential tax hike. Labour's own spending programme amounted to massively more than those on the Opposition Front Bench ever admitted.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lamont: No.

I have always said that, as we move out of a phase of recession into recovery, there will be good figures and bad figures. One indicator, however, does not appear in the books: it can be seen only from the Conservative Benches. That indicator is the length of the faces of Opposition Treasury spokesmen. As the news gets better, those faces get longer—none more so than that of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, who likes nothing more than a relentless diet of gloom and depression.

What a miserable time the hon. Gentleman had last week. On Monday, there was the news that manufacturing output had risen by 0·8 per cent., to its highest level since August 1991. Then, on Wednesday, retail sales were shown to have been nearly 2 per cent. higher in the last three months than they were a year earlier. On Thursday, the hon. Gentleman's face grew longer and longer as unemployment actually fell. A few more weeks like that, and he will be positively suicidal.

Opposition Members complain when we accuse them of talking Britain down. I shall set a simple test, in which I may have to involve my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. We shall launch a nationwide hunt over the next week: no stone will be left unturned, no avenue unexplored. We shall look everywhere. Nothing will stop us from finding the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East's press release welcoming Thursday's drop in unemployment.

Of course, the hon. Gentleman has a long track record. On Wednesday, he told us—we know how much weight to place on it—

"I make one Budget forecast—that, after the Budget, unemployment will rise this month".—[Official Report, 17 March; Vol. 221, c. 289.]

True to form, the hon. Gentleman was wrong, as always.

British business is well placed to succeed and expand in the rest of 1993. My Budget will keep Britain on track for recovery. It is good for exporters; it is good for jobs; it will ensure sound finance; it will bring taxes down. And at the next election we shall bring Labour down—to their fifth and final defeat.

Resolved,

That the Value Added Tax Act 1983 shall have effect in relation to supplies of goods which (disregarding section 5 of that Act) are made on or after 1st April 1993 with the insertion after section 37B of the following section—

"Customers to account for tax on supplies of gold etc.

37C.—(1) Where any person makes a supply of gold to another person and that supply is a taxable supply but not a zero-rated supply, the supply shall be treated for the purposes of Schedule 1 to this Act—

(a) as a taxable supply of that other person (as well as a taxable supply of the person who makes it); and

(b) in so far as that other person is supplied in connection with the carrying on by him of any business, as a supply made by him in the course of furtherance of that business, but nothing in paragraph (b) above shall require any supply to be disregarded for the purposes of that Schedule on the grounds that it is a supply of capital assets of that other person's business.

(2) Where a taxable person makes a supply of gold to a person who—

(a) is himself a taxable person at the time when the supply is made; and

(b) is supplied in connection with the carrying on by him of any business.

it shall be for the person supplied, on the supplier's behalf, to account for and pay tax on the supply, and not for the supplier.

(3) So much of this Act and of any other enactment or any subordinate legislation as has effect for the purposes of, or in connection with, the enforcement of any obligation to account for and pay value added tax shall apply for the purposes of this section in relation to any person who is required under subsection (2) above to account for and pay any tax as if that tax were tax on a supply made by him.

(4) Section 5(1) to (5) above shall not apply for determining when any supply of gold is to be treated as taking place.

(5) References in this section to a supply of gold are references to—

(a) any supply of goods consisting in gold, including gold coins, or

(b) any supply of goods containing gold where the consideration for the supply (apart from any tax) is, or is equivalent to, an amount which does not exceed, or exceeds by no more than a negligible amount, the open market value of the gold contained in the goods."

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees.).

SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO (TRADE SANCTIONS)

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 7150/92, 7945/92, 8365/92, 8409/92, 10528/92 and 11236/92, relating to the imposition of trade sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro; and, while endorsing the Government's view that all steps necessary to ensure the effective implementation of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro should be taken, believes that further action enforcing sanctions is needed.—[Mr. Wood.]

Question agreed to.

Tin Mining Subsidence (Cornwall)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

10.41 pm

Mr. Sebastian Coe (Falmouth and Camborne): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise in the House a pressing concern that has consistently effected my constituency and the rest of Cornwall—damage to property resulting from tin mining subsidence. I refer to all Cornwall because, in Gunnerslake, my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) has been working hard for the past three months on behalf of three constituents who have suffered from such damage. My hon. Friend is, unfortunately, unable to be with us this evening.

Before informing hon. Members of the situation we face in Cornwall, I should like to outline briefly the history and significance of tin mining to that county.

Much of the tin mining was situated in the district of Kerrier. Its rich deposits of tin were exploited from the earliest times, and the urban area of Redruth grew up around the mines. By the 15th century, tin mining was emerging as a central and vital feature of the Cornish economy. Its importance was borne out by the power invested in the Stannary courts. As far back as 1305, Edward 1, through two different charters, one for Cornwall and one for Devon, outlined the privileges granted to tinners. That helped to create the situation described by the Cornish historian, Philip Payton, of tinners being "a class of independent workers, living and working according to their own rules, answerable only to their kind, and jealous of their rights and privileges."

They were a little like hon. Members in this place.

As mining grew in importance in the Cornish economy, it began to command deep respect and status, and it was followed by other Cornish industries. That influence of immense importance went a long way towards moulding modern Cornwall's socio-economic fabric.

The industrial revolution and the arrival of steam engines helped to propel the tin industry into modern times, and Cornwall managed to command a near-monopoly of world production. That emphasises the uniqueness of Cornwall and the sharp difference between its economy and that of the rest of England which, in structure, remains the case today.

Scarcely a week goes by without a report in a local newspaper of someone suffering damage to property as a result of old tin mining works. Such subsidence causes various problems to property that is highlighted by searches, surveys and inspections. It does not need the trained eye to notice the obvious cracks in structure and ceilings, but whose role is it to compensate for such devaluation of property? The standard answer is that, after any subsidence from mining, the owner of the surface has the right to bring legal action against whoever did the mining.

For coal, there is an alternative course of action, which is normally much easier and more suitable: to claim compensation work to make good property from British Coal. That option, or its equivalent, does not exist for tin mining. There are no special Acts, and there is no single state-owned operator that has taken on the assets and liabilities of previous operations.

Following the decline of the industry, mines were abandoned and, after selling marketable equipment, little tidying up was done. In many cases, tips, shafts and engine houses remained for long periods in a state much as when the mine was closed. Subsequently, some of the tips were worked over and the material reprocessed, and some engine houses were dismantled. More recently, mine waste has been quarried for landfill.

The expansion of the industry and increase in population in recent years has resulted in a shortage of suitable building land. Large parts of the district of Kerrier are unavailable for development, either to protect unexploited mineral reserves or because of environmental constraints. That means that there is considerable pressure to redevelop land left derelict as the result of mining activity. Planning policies at county and district levels reflect local concern about the extent and impact of derelict land. Those authorities are committed to bringing derelict land back into use.

It is usual when buying a property to find a provision that retains the mining rights for some other owner. Indeed, in most cases, mineral ownership is totally severed from the surface freehold. Most mines were abandoned a long time ago, and the ownership of the mining rights has disseminated and become uncertain over time. One may be able to trace part-owners—for example, someone owning 13/365ths—but no complete ownership due to the nature of the inheritance. Some 100 years ago, there may have been one or two owners, but not now.

Liability is almost impossible to work out, particularly as many of the mines, especially in Redruth, predate 1872 and were not required to be registered. Without the ability to trace an owner for liability, to whom could a household with a property damaged by subsidence go for compensation?

The only other alternative is to look to insurance companies. However, they are now refusing to provide cover for certain areas, and often refuse even to consider particular post codes. I am the first to defend the right of a commercial enterprise to choose its own custom, but the present practice does not help my constituents. The insurance companies could be considered to be inflexible by refusing to insure any house in a specific district. That displays a lack of understanding. Tin mines, unlike coal mines, are worked via vertical shafts, not horizontal ones. Therefore, one house may be affected, and a house two doors down may not be.

The issue of damages and who is liable is central to my concern. Halsbury's "Laws of England", volume 31, section 117, describes how damages are decided. I do not intend to detain the House with the legalese, nor do I wish to "do a Rumpole", but the process is clearly described. When subsidence occurs after the original owner has ceased to own the property, a later occupier is not generally liable for the subsidence. Due to the confiscatory nature of death duties in earlier times, the state acquired all the benefits of the land, but none of the liabilities.

I shall draw a comparison with the position relating to coal mining subsidence. In essence, the coal case is far easier and better controlled, partly because it is covered by specific legislation—most recently the Coal Mining Subsidence Act 1991. British Coal has to accept liability, no matter which coal mining concern originally caused the damage. Compensation is paid, or work to make good undertaken, provided only that the claim is made within six years of the damage becoming apparent.

[Mr. Sebastian Coe]

If agreements cannot be reached, the claimants can appeal to the Lands Tribunal. Alternatively they can use the cheap arbitration scheme organised by British Coal, and run by the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators. This is a far more favourable position than that held by tin mining subsidence sufferers in my constituency.

In fact, the problems are much greater even than the law suggests, because of the difficulty in tracing the owner of the minerals, let alone the defunct company which did the mining. As I have already stated, the minerals owner is normally not the same person as the surface freeholder, and it is extremely difficult to discover who the mineral owner is. The Chamber of Mines has a confidential list of some owners, but even these will not normally allow their names to go to the householders threatening legal action. The Duchy of Cornwall is the largest minerals owner but also the most secretive: it has actually removed its records to London so as to make it virtually impossible for potential litigants to discover when the Duchy is liable.

It is also unlikely that a surveyor could be sued for failing to notify a householder. Solicitors organise searches for mine workings, but their reports would be worded so as to protect them from liability if subsidence later occurred.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I think that the hon. Gentleman is aware that a constituent of mine died when a shaft opened up under her immediately outside her back door. The family has since campaigned hard to obtain all possible information on where the shafts are. Not only is it difficult to trace those who may have worked the mine or who may have the mineral rights, but the very existence of the problem is almost impossible to determine, given the history of this mining. Yet the council, which might be able to provide the information, is given no funding at all for gathering such information in what would be a major undertaking. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will impress that point on the Minister.

Mr. Coe: I welcome that intervention. A mining search, of course, is only as good as the records that are consulted —and as the interpretation put on them by the researcher. On the whole, the records are notoriously poor, but common sense dictates that local councils, through archives or local knowledge, must be aware of the situation of most of these mines, and must therefore be in a position to advise potential developers where they are located.

The position is very unsatisfactory, and might be made even worse by a court ruling two years ago that the National Trust, as surface freeholder, was liable to cap an uncapped mine shaft on land that it had recently bought. That might suggest that householders would in future be liable to cap mineshafts in similar circumstances.

I am not attempting to suggest a solution to this immense problem, but something must be done. The "polluter pays" principle simply cannot work in this case. Morally, compensation must be the order of the day. I hope that this debate will prompt the Minister to reconsider the situation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) has set out thoroughly the problems facing parts of Redruth and the whole of Cornwall arising from historic tin mining. He has shown admirable concern for the plight of his constituents who are adversely affected. I congratulate him on raising this matter and on the clear way he has presented the issues. As he said, our hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) has also activley sought solutions to these problems.

Since problems of mining subsidence are not restricted to Cornwall, perhaps it would be helpful if I explained the Government's general approach to the problems of historic mining activity before looking at the situation in Cornwall.

Britain has a long history of mining for a wide variety of minerals. Apart from the coalfields, there are the metal mining fields of Devon and Cornwall, the Mendips, Wales, the Pennine uplands and the Lake district, and the salt mines of Cheshire. The old limestone mines of the black country have also become well known over the last 10 years or so and much of the building stone for Bath was provided by underground mining. Less well known are the sand and sandstone mines of west Yorkshire, Lancashire and Surrey, chalk mines throughout the south-east, including several in London, and other mines for iron ore and ironstone, potash, gypsum, anhydride, ball clay, fullers earth, fireclay, slate, chert and flint. There are examples in many of those areas of subsidence due to old mines causing damaging to property. Because reliable records are available only since the latter half of the 19th century, the first intimation of earlier mine workings has often been the occurrence of subsidence.

In support of the development of land use planning policy, we have carried out a number of mining-related research projects over the last 10 years or so. These have included specific area studies of limestone working in the black country, coal mining in south Wales, chalk and flint mining in Norwich and metal mining in Cornwall. Studies of the methods of treatment of disused mine shafts and of compiling and using information on mining were published in 1988.

The broad national picture was obtained during the "Review of mining instability in Great Britain", published in 1992. As well as regional and technical reports, that includes a case study report specifically on metalliferous mines in Kerrier, of which my hon. Friend is aware. That research has supported the development of advice in planning policy guidance note 14, "Development on unstable land", published in April 1990. This advises that, where development is proposed in areas which are known or suspected to be undermined, due account should be taken of the potential effects of subsidence on that development.

The responsibility for investigating a site to determine whether subsidence is likely to be a problem is that of the developer. However, local planning authorities are advised that they should regard the possibility of mining subsidence as a material planning consideration and take account of it at all stages of the planning process. Purchasers are also advised that they should make such inquiries as they consider necessary to satisfy themselves as to the stability of the land. It is recognised, however, that searches are only as good as the information available—a point rightly made by my hon. Friend. For many mining areas, information, when it exists, is often not readily available.

More specific planning guidance on the treatment of disused mine openings and the availability of information on mined ground is currently being developed. I hope to be able to publish it later in the year. We shall continue to review the effectiveness of our policies in reducing the impact of subsidence and will consider the need for further guidance.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister has touched on a point that I raised earlier about the availability of information. As I said, a constituent of mine died, having had no information that there might be a problem. The local borough council—and, I believe, all other councils in Cornwall—has sought to gather information but, as the Minister will understand, it is an expensive process. In the review, will he consider the possibility of funding councils for part of the costs of gathering such information so that it can be made available to people?

Mr. Baldry: I shall come to that point when I discuss the historic position.

Whatever consideration is now given to new development—much of what I have said has related to new development—it is a fact of life that much of the development in this country preceded such considerations. Indeed, all the matters which are the cause of concern in Cornwall preceded them. Consequently, there are many areas where development has already taken place above old mine workings and thus may be at risk from subsidence. That is what happened in the case raised by the hon. Gentleman and in other places in Cornwall.

Derelict land grant funding has therefore been made available for the investigation and treatment of land liable to become derelict due to actual or apprehended subsidence due to abandoned underground mines. Land likely to be affected by subsidence cause by coal mining was excluded because it was already covered by the Coal Mining (Compensation for Subsidence) Acts. Derelict land grant funding for the stabilisation of underground mines is available in Cornwall. It is a precondition of that that local authorities will have to have some regard to where such mines might be if they are to have derelict land grant funding.

Financial help has been given to the treatment of tin mines in Cornwall. In 1988, we made it clear that derelict land grant would be available for the capping or back-filling of mine shafts, even where the work does not form part of a wider scheme for the reclamation of derelict land. Priority has been given to the treatment of mine shafts on land needed for development or redevelopment, or with a high degree of public access—such as open land next to a footpath. My hon. Friend will be aware that as a consequence of that initiative intensive shaft-capping programmes have been undertaken by both Kerrier and Carrick district councils—so we have invested substantial sums of money to help tackle that problem.

Our general approach to the problems of mining subsidence is thus to attempt to prevent the problems arising by proper consideration within the planning system, and by the use of derelict land grant funds to deal with mine shafts and underground workings where there is a significant element of risk to public safety or where substantial existing development is at risk.

As the House will be aware, the Urban Regeneration Agency will—when it comes into full operation—subsume derelict land grant. As the consultation paper on the agency made clear, in constructing its unified grant regime, and issuing our guidance to the agency, we shall take account of the current priorities for derelict land grant. It will, of course, be for the agency to determine its initial work programme. In doing so, I am confident that it will take full account of existing derelict land grant programmes in Cornwall.

Despite all those measures, subsidence does happen, and I fully appreciate that it causes much distress to people and damage to property that is expensive to repair. As my hon. Friend made clear, apart from coal, there is no statutory compensation scheme and the liability under common law for any damage is that of the person who caused the damage. I fully acknowledge that, in the case of abandoned mines, there is a problem, in that the persons who caused the damage have largely long since disappeared, if they were ever known, and there may be no successors in title other than the surface landowner.

In practice, most household insurance policies cover subsidence, whatever the cause. There is thus a remedy to cover the costs of subsidence damage to property. However, the Government recognise that there can be problems and my hon. Friend argued the case for a publicly funded compensation scheme to cover such cases. Insurance policies normally cover damage to property, but a collapse in the garden or grounds which does not affect the property or cause loss of value due to the perception of subsidence risk may not be covered. The commercial judgment of insurance companies may also result in difficulties in obtaining insurance cover where properties have already been damaged by subsidence or where a threat of subsidence has been identified.

Such problems have arisen not just in Cornwall but in other areas affected by historic mining. The proposal for a publicly funded compensation scheme was carefully considered in 1987 in respect of limestone mines in the black country. It was concluded that the insurance industry already provided protection in respect of subsidence damage under normal household building insurance contracts, and it was felt inappropriate for central Government to fund any such scheme.

However, assurances were obtained from the major insurers providing household insurance and from the Building Societies Association that they would not discriminate against areas potentially at risk from limestone subsidence, provided that there was no evidence of existing damage to the property involved. That means that insurance risks and mortgage applications are considered on their merits. Subsidence cover is available at standard terms and conditions, subject to normal underwriting considerations.

My officials will certainly raise the issues mentioned by my hon. Friend with the Association of British Insurers as part of their continuing discussions on limestone and other mining subsidence, and I will ensure that they pay particular regard to the problems identified in Cornwall.

Within my hon. Friend's constituency have been found the richest deposits of tin and copper in the British Isles. The area contains some of the longest-lived and most famous mines of south-west England, as well as the sole surviving tin mine at South Crofty. The area also has a long history of subsidence dating from the time of mining or shortly after abandonment. As my hon. Friend knows, that is continuing.

It must be said, however, that, considering the amount of mining that took place, the amount of subsidence is relatively limited. That is largely dues to the strength of the rock surrounding the workings and their narrowness and depth. My hon. Friend described the nature of tin workings, which is somewhat different from that of some other minerals. I fully realise, however, that that is not much compensation for the individuals whose properties have been affected.

An analysis of 74 subsidence events in Kerrier district between 1974 and 1990 formed part of the case study that I have already mentioned: it showed that shaft collapses are the most common type of subsidence event, constituting 41 of the 74. Although that is a significant number, it represents a small proportion of the 6,000-plus shafts estimated to be in Kerrier, and the 12,000-plus in Cornwall as a whole. Collapses of unstable shallow stope workings are much less frequent, although they can affect larger areas than shaft collapses. About one third of those subsidence events were on public highways or in open spaces, or near enough to such areas to present a danger to public safety. About one third involved damage to gardens and grounds of properties. Only nine of the 74 involved structural damage to buildings—that is, only nine out of some 12,000 shafts.

Other parts of Cornwall also suffer from shaft collapse and subsidence. The events at Gunnislake last summer were widely reported in the national press. Two houses have had to be demolished, and derelict land grant has been awarded to Caradon district council to treat the shafts and to counter the threat of subsidence damage to land beyond the confines of the individual properties.

My hon. Friend is also aware of the concern with which local authorities in Cornwall regard the problems of historic mining. The local planning authorities are diligent in their consideration of mining issues, which is based both on their own records and the advice of the mineral valuers. Both the county and district councils co-operated fully with my Department's research at Chacewater and St. Day in the mid-1980s. That study aimed to develop techniques to enable planners and developers better to take account of ground conditions in this and other metal-mining areas. The computerised database which resulted was transferred to the county council as a basis for extension to other parts of the county as and when the opportunity arose. I understand that it is used fairly intensively.

The local authorities have also carried out a number of land reclamation schemes, funded by derelict land grant, to enable derelict mining areas to be put to alternative use —providing, for instance, housing, industrial development or public open space. The treatment of mine shafts and workings within the schemes, and the shaft capping programmes that I have already mentioned, have been funded where they represent value for money.

In Cornwall, as elsewhere, the costs involved need to be justified by a significant threat to the public and/or a large number of properties. Where only single properties are affected by collapse or the threat of subsidence, it has generally been regarded as a matter for the property owners or their insurers. Clearly, with limited derelict land grant funds available and many competing demands, it is not possible for every incident to be remedied from the public purse when alternatives are available in the insurance market. It would not be appropriate for the Government to act on all occasions as insurer of last resort.

My hon. Friend should also note that—even when derelict land grant has been paid for the treatment of shafts or mine workings—if properties have been damaged, compensation for the structures has been dealt with by the owners' insurers. If it has been necessary to acquire the land to enable the reclamation scheme to be carried out it has been acquired at derelict land value only.

Obviously, it would not be proper for me to comment on individual cases, but in correspondence my hon. Friend has explained a situation which is causing particular concern in Clinton road, Redruth, where a number of shallow workings close to the surface have suffered subsidence from time to time. I have not been approached by Kerrier district council for derelict land grant support either to investigate the problems in the area or to deal with individual collapses. If I were, I should consider the request with care. However, it will be clear from what I have already said that the treatment of collapses affecting individual properties is generally regarded as a matter for owners and their insurers. If there is a wider problem, the investigation and treatment of the shallow workings could be a possible candidate for derelict land grant funding. Should an application be received, I will ensure that it is carefully considered in the light of the availability of funds and competing demands.

We recognise the problem of historic mining, which affects my hon. Friend's constituents and other Cornwall constituencies. Although we do not consider that a publicly funded compensation scheme is justified, we are working actively to reduce the problems both nationally and in Cornwall by carrying out appropriate research, developing advice to enable the problems to be avoided where possible and making available derelict land grant funds to deal with the problems where the costs can be justified by the risk to public safety or to substantial existing development.

Obviously, I shall continue to keep the matter under review and to take a keen interest in the representatives made by my hon. Friend and other Cornwall Members.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

Community Care

1. Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how she intends to promote the interests of the users of community care services.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tim Yeo): At the very heart of our community care reforms lies the principle that all decisions about services must reflect the individual needs and wishes of users of the services and of anyone who helps to care for them.

Mr. Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important aspects of the community care reforms is that they put the user and carer at the centre of services rather than the periphery? Under the old system, far too often needs were dictated by the local authority and trade unions. Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that he will take steps to ensure that Labour-run local authorities that have the task of making decisions do so in the interests of users and not in the interests of the local authorities themselves and trade unions?

Mr. Yeo: Extensive precautions have been taken to minimise the risk that any local authority, however doctrinaire or incompetent, can undermine the reforms. We are requiring 85 per cent. of the money being transferred from the Department of Social Security to be spent in the independent sector—on buying from voluntary and private organisations—to ensure that the local authority does not spend it on empire building. We will monitor changes as they take place and we are determined that the best safeguard that anyone can have against users' wishes being ignored is for more Conservative-controlled councils to be elected on 6 May.

Mr. Hinchliffe: What action will the Minister take to promote the interests of those users of residential care who are to lose their £45 per week residential allowance as a direct result of Government policy? If such people go into hospital or go on holiday and are away from their home for more than six days they may lose their place in the home. Will the Minister act to convince users and carers that 1 April is more than just an attempt to reduce the Government's income support expenditure? He can do so by listening to demands for advocacy arrangements, assessment appeals, reassessments and reviews. Is not the Government's total lack of real commitment to change quite obvious from the fact that they discourage the recording of unmet need, which is surely the first port of call for improving community care and genuine reforms?

Mr. Yeo: I am not sure which of the hon. Gentleman's five questions displays the greatest ignorance of the changes that we are about to make. There is no question of any financial saving being achieved in the short term by the policies, as all the money that would have been spent by the Department of Social Security on the higher rates of income support has been transferred to local authorities. In addition, we have added a further £140 million to ensure that they can carry out the assessments. It will be for the local authorities to make the necessary contractual arrangements with residential homes to ensure that the position of people who enter hospital for short periods is protected. We have resourced the authorities to do the job and I have every confidence that the vast majority of Conservative councils will grasp their responsibilities enthusiastically and deliver a high standard of care which meets individual needs.

There is no confusion about unmet need. Decisions are based on an objective assessment of an individual's need. It is a matter for the authority if, for the purposes of planning its services in the longer term, it wishes to keep some record of needs which it would be desirable to meet but which it is not necessary to meet immediately.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my hon. Friend advise Opposition Members to visit Dorset, and Bournemouth in particular, where they can see in action an outstanding example of community care—an example that can serve for the whole of the rest of the nation? That has been achieved by a Conservative-controlled county council which is wholly free of debt, unlike councils controlled by the Labour party.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is so persuasive that I have had a word with the Secretary of State and she has agreed to pay a visit to Bournemouth on Friday. I am grateful to him for drawing attention to the financial position of Dorset county council. Across the country, expenditure on social services has risen by two thirds in real terms since 1979. In the past three years the standard spending assessment for personal social services has risen by one fifth in real terms. On top of all that, we are transferring a further £565 million to local authorities in England to deliver this new reform.

Treatment (Delay)

2. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to ensure that no patients with urgent conditions are having their treatment delayed due to the early completion of contracts.

The Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): Emergency cases are treated immediately and urgent cases are treated as soon as possible according to clinical need. In a letter to the chairman of the Joint Consultants Committee on 23 February, I made it clear that, whatever the particular social circumstances, there can be no question of patients requiring urgent investigation or treatment having it delayed because they come forward towards the end of the financial year. We have issued further guidance to the NHS on managing activity and change, and the JCC has supported that guidance.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Secretary of State find it satisfactory that hospitals scrabbling around for money to keep going until the end of the financial year get GP fund holders to give them patients while GPs who are not fund holders but have more seriously ill patients have to wait longer? Will she advise the Secretary of State for Scotland to learn from this fiasco in England and not to impose it on Scotland?

Mrs. Bottomley: I find it extremely satisfactory that we have the fewest ever patients waiting more than one year. I find it extremely satisfactory that from 1 April no one will wait more than 18 months for a hip, knee or cataract operation. I find it exceedingly satisfactory that the trusts have gone ahead and dealt with more patients. In the first nine months of the year, 325,000 more patients were treated than in the year before. Certainly we need to match activity and resourcess. The agreement with the JCC on GP fund holders makes it clear that patients will be treated without disadvantage to other NHS patients.

Mr. Lidington: Is my right hon. Friend aware that at Stoke Mandeville hospital, which has had financial problems in the past year, staff have managed to cut waiting lists and waiting times and to increase the number of patients treated by more than 2,000? Is that not a tribute to the efforts of all the staff, and will not the service that they provide be improved still further when the £29 million capital spending planned for Stoke Mandeville comes into operation?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is exactly right, and I can confirm his figures. Stoke Mandeville has made excellent progress. As with other hospitals, and as it has ever been in the NHS, activity and resources must be managed through the year, but Stoke Mandeville, like so many other hospitals, is treating more patients to a higher standard and cutting waiting times. The staff are to be warmly congratulated. Once again, the NHS reforms have shown that they result in better and more patient care.

Ms Lynne: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that the fiasco of the past few months, with beds closing throughout the country and urgent cases not being treated, will not be repeated at the end of the next financial year?

Mrs. Bottomley: I can inform the hon. Lady that we have established a working party with the profession, and I quote Stanley Simmons, chairman of the Conference of Medical Royal Colleges:

"the Conference of Medical Royal Colleges is encouraged to work constructively with the Management Executive to address those issues that have emerged and to that end expect to make positive recommendations in the coming months".

We want to be sure that work is under way between management and clinicians to ensure that activity is better balanced. I am sure that the hon. Lady would be the first to pay tribute to the fact that more patients are being treated and waiting times have been coming down. It is just a question of ensuring that the contracts are better adapted throughout the year.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Lancaster Acute Hospital Trust on achieving 2·5 per cent. above target and 25 per cent. above target with day cases? Thanks to the Lancaster health authority putting in more money, no urgent or emergency patients are waiting and it is still increasing its patient load.

Mrs. Bottomley: Once again, my hon. Friend has it exactly right. More money is going in; £100 million a day being spent on the NHS. What is important is not only the money going in, but the organisation and the output of the resources. There is no doubt that NHS trusts are delivering better, higher quality care. Patients are being treated and waiting times are coming right down.

Dental Checks

3. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dental checks were carried out on non-exempt patients in (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1988-89.

The Minister for Health (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): From the information available, it is not possible to differentiate between those dental examinations provided to exempt and non-exempt patients.

The total number of dental examinations carried out in 1991-92 in England and Wales was 20·9 million, and in 1988-89 it was 22 million.

Mr. Chisholm: What impact does the Minister expect the imposition of 80 per cent. dental charges and the lack of NHS dentists to have on the number of people coming forward for dental checks? What are the health and financial implications of people not seeking dental treatment because they are deterred by the 80 per cent. charge until they need emergency treatment?

Dr. Mawhinney: The hon. Gentleman will be encouraged to know, as I am, that in the six months during which the regrettable attitude taken by some dentists in the NHS has been progressing, the number of adult patients registered in England has increased by 600,000, contrary to the perception that many people have. We remain of the view—as I believe the Labour party does, although it will not say so—that those patients who are capable of making a contribution towards the cost of their dental treatment should do so.

Mr. Simon Coombs: How many dentists are now being employed directly by family health services authorities?

Dr. Mawhinney: As my hon. Friend rightly implies, the FHSAs have the ability to employ salaried dentists. [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] The last time I saw the figure, which was about 10 days ago, it was something over 60. If the figure has moved significantly since then, I will write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. McCartney: I thought that the Minister was coming to the Dispatch Box to apologise for the imposition of the 80 per cent. charges. During 1991-92, 1 million nursing mothers and pregnant women used dental services. Sir Kenneth Bloomfield, a personal friend of the Minister of State, is recommending the withdrawal of free dental services for that group of women. Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that, after the Bloomfield report, those women will retain their right to free dental treatment and that he will not impose on them the 80 per cent. charge, which in effect is an 80p in the pound health tax?

Dr. Mawhinney: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I have already started to consult on the Bloomfield report, just as we promised that we would. If he would like to come to give me the views of the Labour party, I should be more than happy to hear him, as indeed I was when I consulted the Labour party on the Tomlinson report. We have not yet made any decisions; when we do, we will let the hon. Gentleman know.

GP Fund Holders

4. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of general practitioner fund holders in the Wessex health region.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are 32 fund holders in Wessex at present and a further 23 are preparing to join on 1 April.

Mr. Hunter: Can my hon. Friend confirm that there will soon be 11 fund-holding practices in and around Basingstoke, serving 65 per cent. of the population? Is that not further evidence that the argument has been won and that doctors and patients increasingly realise that the health service is better when general practitioners become fund holders?

Dr. Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I have no doubt that he has contributed to the thinking in Basingstoke and in the area which has resulted in that marvellous record of GP fund holders. In so doing, my hon. Friend will have acted in the best interests of his constituents, because there is no doubt that the patients of GP fund holders receive better services and appreciate those services more than used to be the case.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: Has the Minister received any representations from GP fund holders to the effect that they increasingly find themselves under pressure from patients who want to know where they will be referred, to choose their surgeon and to know——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Wessex health region. He has not yet used the word Wessex.

Mr. Wardell: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for that advice.

Has the Minister received any representations from Wessex GP fund holders to the effect that they are under increasing pressure from patients demanding certain pills and certain surgeons to carry out certain operations? What protection will the Minister offer to those GP fund holders when that pressure in Wessex arises?

Dr. Mawhinney: Doctor magazine carried out an extensive survey of patients of GP fund holders, including those in Wessex, and found that 70 per cent. of them had experienced a decrease in waiting times, 60 per cent. had experienced improved services, including follow-up appointments, and more than 50 per cent. of fund holders were providing additional services, such as physiotherapy and consultant clinics in surgeries. Given those results and that reflection of patient satisfaction, and given that extension of GP fund holder services in Wessex and around the country, it would be surprising if those patients were complaining.

Mr. David Martin: Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite the Labour party's continued opposition to this excellent reform, experience in Portsmouth of fund holding is similar to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter)? Will the minimum size of practices eligible to become fund holders be reduced so that fund holding can be enjoyed by practices with lists of fewer than the present minimum of 7,500?

Dr. Mawhinney: I entirely endorse what my hon. Friend says about his part of the country. The size of qualifying fund-holding practices will be reduced on 1 April and we are looking for further ways to make it possible for practices with fewer patients to combine in various ways so that the benefits of fund holding can be made as widely available as possible.

Benzodiazepines

5. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will establish an independent committee of inquiry into the effects of the benzodiazepine group of drugs.

Mr. Yeo: I have no plans to do so. The Committee on Safety of Medicines is an independent advisory group which has reviewed the safety of benzodiazepines. To reduce the problem of dependence, it recommended restrictions on their use. The committee continues to monitor the situation.

Mr. Griffiths: As problems existed more than 10 years ago, is it not a pity that the committee did not report much earlier? As the Legal Aid Board is likely to deprive more than 6,000 people of cases against companies such as Roche, would it not be a good thing and a matter of Christian charity for the Minister to undertake an inquiry so that people such as my constituent Mrs. Molly Jones, who has had her life shattered by the use of such drugs, can gain some compensation without incurring huge legal fees in pursuing companies such as Roche?

Mr. Yeo: Questions about legal aid are for my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, who answers for the Lord Chancellor in the House. The number of benzodiazepine prescriptions dispensed has fallen by 40 per cent. since 1979, so I think that the change in prescribing practice does go back to the period to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Detailed guidance on prescribing is given in the British National Formulary, which is a major reference source for drugs and is issued free to all doctors. I think that it is clear that we have responded to the concerns expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

Ms Primarolo: The Minister will acknowledge that the dangers of dependency on benzodiazepines are well known. The request for the inquiry is based on the understanding that the drug has been licensed for a long time and has caused immense agony and problems in the lives of many people, especially women.

Will the Minister consider taking a number of steps further to control the prescribing of this drug? First, will he request that GPs be required to hand-write the prescription script so that it is drawn to their attention? Many people are given repeat prescriptions when they should not be. Secondly, will he ensure that the time is limited to 10 days, which is the recommended period for the safety of these medicines? Thirdly, will the Government consider banning the capsules which are so dangerous and are so misused, particularly by young people, in the abuse of drugs?

Mr. Yeo: The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs has proposed that some benzodiazepines should be rescheduled, which would give a stricter regime and would involve the hand-writing of prescriptions. That will be considered. The question of the period over which these drugs should be used is also subject to guidance given to all doctors. It is now generally regarded as best practice to confine the period of use to a relatively short time. The guidance is not confined to the British National Formulary. In the mental illness key area handbook, which was published earlier this year following the identification of mental illness as a key area under the White Paper "The Health of the Nation", suggestions have been made that family health services authorities should discuss with general practitioners local targets for reducing benzodiazepine prescriptions.

NHS Trusts

6. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts are due to start in the west midlands region in April; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: From 1 April, 15 units will become operational as national health service trusts in the West Midlands regional health authority. This will bring the total number of trusts in the region to 25.

Mr. Luff: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I invite him to welcome the application from Worcester royal infirmary and my local ambulance service for trust status from April 1994. Does he agree that this will result in a significant improvement in the quality of health care for my constituents? Bearing in mind that trust hospitals in the West Midlands region have increased the number of patients treated by some 5 per cent. compared with a little over 3 per cent. for the region as a whole, does he agree that it is time that the Labour party applied the test set by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook)—that trusts should be judged by the number of patients they treat—and admitted that the Opposition got it wrong and we got it right?

Dr. Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in all the points that he makes, particularly the last one. I have no doubt that his constituents will benefit from the fact that Worcester royal infirmary has applied for fourth-wave trust status. I know that he will be pleased, as I was, to learn that the West Midlands regional health authority has agreed a capital scheme for his district general hospital in Worcester, that it will not be affected by the capital moratorium and that work on it will start soon.

Mr. Burden: As the Government are now encouraging extra national health trusts in the west midlands, will the Minister comment on the assurances given by the former chair of West Midlands regional health authority—described by the Secretary of State as someone who has made an outstanding contribution to the health service—who said that no further trusts in the Birmingham area would be supported until a major hospital rebuilding programme was nearing completion because trusts were incompatible with strategic planning? What has changed? Is it the strategic planning which has gone out of the window or is it the hospital rebuilding programme? Or is it just another broken Tory promise?

Dr. Mawhinney: No, it is just another example of the incapability of the Labour party to put the patient first. In terms of the number of patients treated, waiting time figures and the quality of service offered to patients, all the evidence shows that trusts are delivering the quality of service that patients want. From this April, they will become the normal mode of delivering health care in this country. We know that the Opposition do not like that, but patients do.

Treatments (Mersey Region)

7. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were treated in the Mersey region in the last year for which figures are available and the previous year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): The figures are 397,000 in 1990-91 and 425,000 in 1991-92: a rise of 7 per cent. over the year.

Mr. Brandreth: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging information. Is he aware that the Mersey region has been the most successful region in the country at implementing the health reforms, with more trusts, more fund holders and lower waiting lists? Will he join me in congratulating the staff at the Countess of Chester hospital on the service that they deliver to patients and on the fact that they achieve trust status next week?

Mr. Sackville: I will certainly join my hon. Friend in that. In the sea of municipal despair that characterised the major city of the region during much of the decade, Mersey regional health authority stood out like a beacon of hope and humanity. They are all to be congratulated on what has been achieved in the region.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister therefore delighted that the trust that was set up in Crewe, which will be forced into an arrangement with Macclesfield against the wishes of the local people, is in the process of sacking large numbers of nurses? Is that his idea of good health care? I assure him that it does not impress the patients.

Mr. Sackville: I cannot see why the hon. Lady should object about the merger with Macclesfield. In any case, there is no way in which that should lead to a diminution in the employment of nurses.

NHS Trusts

8. Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on progress in establishing hospital trusts.

10. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what, at the latest available date, was the total number of NHS trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of fully operational national health service trusts is 156. This will increase to 293 from 1 April 1993. It is clear that trusts are the management model of service provision for the future. With each successive wave, enthusiasm and support are increasing.

Sir Roger Moate: Does my right hon. Friend recall the almost hysterical opposition of the Labour party to NHS trusts? Will she contrast that with the widespread welcome and growing enthusiasm for what is proving to be the most successful form of devolved management and local responsibility? Is not the concept so successful that very soon most hospitals will be managed in that way and very soon we will have the support even of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)? It will not be long before the Liberal party claims that it thought of the idea first.

Mrs. Bottomley: To use the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), "They got it wrong and we got it right." National health service trusts are here to stay. They are good for patients and for staff. It must be said that throughout the country NHS trusts are treating more patients to a better standard and are reducing waiting times. I will wait and see whether we will convince the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) at this stage.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that the first wave of hospital trusts cost the British taxpayer £1·17 billion just to set them up; that it cost a further £800 million for the second wave and another £1 billion for the third wave, making £3 billion in all which has been taken from taxpayers' pockets just to set the trusts up? The Government are now calling on pensioners to pay more VAT. If those trusts are so good, why do not Tory Members use them? Why do not the majority of Cabinet members use them? Is not it remarkable that the Government have double standards—trusts for people out there, but they will not touch them with a barge pole? That is why I will be voting to take them back into the national health service where they belong.

Mrs. Bottomley: I am very surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman's comments. Having been to a great many NHS trust hospitals and used the services of those trusts, I do not know for whom he is speaking. As ever, he has turned down the opportunity to tell the House what is happening at his local hospital, which will become a trust on 1 April. Like all other members of the Labour party, he always takes the opportunity to denigrate the achievements of the national health service, rather than sing its praises. Let me tell my hon. Friends that the Chesterfield and North Derbyshire royal hospital treated an extra 2,700 patients this year. That hospital, which is to become a trust on 1 April, will have no patients waiting for 18 months and very few waiting for more than 12 months. The hon. Gentleman's constituents who use it benefit from an ever-higher standard of health care. When it becomes a trust, it will, like others, go from strength to strength.

Dame Jill Knight: Has my right hon. Friend yet been able to persuade, cajole or charm the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) to say whether a Labour Government would abolish trusts? Does she think that the hon. Gentleman's reluctance to speak——

Madam Speaker: Order. As the hon. Lady is aware, the Secretary of State has no responsibility for the attitude of any other hon. Member. He responsibility is for the policy of her Department. Will the hon. Lady please rephrase her question?

Dame Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend ensure the safety of hospital trusts, whoever may be in charge of them in the future? The citizens of Birmingham, where trusts are becoming very popular, are determined that we should hold to this policy, as it is undoubtedly the best means of serving patients.

Mrs. Bottomley: It is almost a year since the general election, yet the Labour party still has a policy-free zone in respect of the health service and NHS trusts. Perhaps on 1 April, when a further 138 trusts are established, the Opposition will declare that they have been April fools and will see the light. I refer Labour Members to remarks of the previous Labour spokesman on health, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who, two years ago, challenged the Secretary of State for Health

"to measure the success of those trusts that opted out by the simple test of whether they do more or less work on NHS patients."—[Official Report, 17 April 1991; Vol. 189, c. 457.]

They have done more work. It is time for Labour Members to think about the present and the future and leave their antediluvian attitudes behind.

Dr. Reid: Apart from devotion to the Conservative party, what are the criteria for appointment to the board of a hospital trust? I put this question because in my area of Lanarkshire there is slight confusion over the announcement that the latest member of the board of Bellshill maternity hospital is a part-time vet. What particular expertise and qualifications will a part-time veterinary surgeon bring to the maternity services of Lanarkshire?

Mrs. Bottomley: We are greatly indebted to all the public-spirited men and women who have served as chairmen and non-executives. The NHS is a major employer—the largest employing organisation—and it needs good management skills. Board members come from a range of backgrounds. But I understand the difficulty of the Labour party. Whereas Conservative Members appreciate the service of those who bring skills from the private sector, the employment spokesman of the Labour party, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), has said of company directors:

"We are envious of their wealth. These people are stinking, lousy, thieving, incompetent scum."

If that is the Labour party's attitude to people who serve in the NHS, I well understand why the nation has no confidence in the party.

Patient Treatments

9. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were treated in the north-western region in the last year for which figures are available and in the previous year.

Mr. Sackville: The figures are 711,000 in 1990-91 and 751,000 in 1991-92, a rise of 6 per cent. This is a remarkable achievement on which I congratulate all those responsible in the north-western region.

Mr. Day: Will my hon. Friend make it clear to the House that the number of patients treated in the north-west is greater than ever before? Will he also take particular note of the fact that in my health authority we have seen the number of patients waiting for 18 months reduced by over three quarters in the past year? Will he, therefore, congratulate those who work in my health authority? Is not it time that the Labour party stopped running down the national health service? In his response, will my hon. Friend point out to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that many Conservative Members rely totally on the NHS for their health care and are proud to do so?

Mr. Sackville: I certainly agree. There are many problems that we need to overcome in running the NHS as successfully as we do and 269 of them are sitting opposite us. We hear moaning and groaning and sniping and griping, but never any congratulations on the achievements of those who work in the national health service.

Mr. Eastham: Is not it time for Ministers to take off the blinkers when quoting some of the figures that they have this afternoon? In Booth Hall children's hospital in my constituency, waiting lists increase monthly. Only last month I exchanged correspondence regarding a doctor who complained that although a child had been referred to the hospital in January 1992, the earliest time that could be promised for surgery was May 1993. Are we saying that this is a success story? If the Minister disagrees with me, let us jump on the train now and check these facts out today.

Mr. Sackville: Let me remind the hon. Gentleman that no one in the region is waiting two years for treatment. A falling number is waiting for one year and we hope to complete the guarantee of 18 months for all hip, knee and cataract opertions. If he will write to me, I will investigate the particular case that he mentioned.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: While I entirely endorse all the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), does my hon. Friend accept that more of the patients in my Macclesfield health authority area are treated in the North-Western regional health authority than are dealt with in the Crewe health authority? Will my hon. Friend therefore oppose the merger of the Macclesfield health authority with the Crewe health authority, a merger which is strongly opposed by the local authorities concerned, a majority of the hon. Members concerned and the community health council? Is there democracy in the health service today or is there not?

Mr. Sackville: Those health authorities that have merged into larger purchasers have found greater efficiencies from doing so and are in a better position to purchase for the needs of the local population.

Hospitals (Charges)

11. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to introduce charges for NHS hospital patients.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are no such plans.

Mr. McAvoy: The Secretary of State must be well aware that her Government briefed the media earlier this month that they were considering the introduction of charges such as those mentioned in my question. What assurance can the Secretary of State give the House that NHS charges for hospital patients will not be introduced? Or will that promise go the same way as the Prime Minister's promise not to introduce value added tax on domestic fuel?

Mrs. Bottomley: That is rich coming from the Labour party, which never comes clean on anything. No one yet knows where the Labour party stands on prescription charges. No one knows where it stands on sight charges. I have made the position quite clear. When it comes to manifestos, we remember that the Labour party said in its 1974 manifesto that it would cut spending on the health service, cut nurses' pay and cut doctors' pay. We have made our commitment to the health service clear. More patients now benefit from free prescriptions. The health service will continue to remain available to all, regardless of ability to pay.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my right hon. Friend confirm to the House that the rumour put about by the Labour party that NHS trust hospitals meant that those hospitals would move out of the NHS and would have to have charges was totally false? During her visit to Dorset this Friday, will she pick on any one of the hospitals in that county to visit, because she will find that every single one is an NHS trust which has no charges whatsoever in it?

Mrs. Bottomley: I look forward to my visit to Dorset. I can confirm my hon. Friend's remarks. The idea of national health service trusts opting out of the health service and charging for services is completely ridiculous. It is the case that in Belgium, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Sweden, and Portugal and New Zealand people are charged for hospital care. The British health service will remain available to all, regardless of means.

Mr. Blunkett: As the much-vaunted Cabinet health committee did not meet and has not considered the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel bills and its impact on the housebound, the elderly and children, how can we possibly believe any of the words used by the Secretary of State for Health who, clearly, has no impact on, or power over, the decisions of her Cabinet colleagues? How can we believe a single pledge from the Tory party's manifesto or the promises given by Conservative Members, in view of what they have done to those most in need by the imposition of that tax on fuel bills?

Mrs. Bottomley: It is positively bizarre that the hon. Gentleman has tried to steer the conversation away from health. Clearly, it is because Opposition Members have no health policy. We have been waiting almost a year for a health statement from the Labour party. I imagine that the delay is because the home policy committee of the Labour party, chaired by Tom Sawyer, has not yet consulted its trade union members on what the health policy might be.

All that I know is that we have delivered and beaten our commitments on health. Waiting times are down and services have been developed and we will continue to do just that.

PRIME MINISTER

Inward Investment

Q1. Mr. Wells: To ask the Prime Minister when he next expects to lead an overseas visit by a group of business men to obtain overseas inward investment or export orders.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): I hope to visit Japan in the autumn, accompanied by a delegation of senior British business men. My ministerial colleagues also take every opportunity to promote Britain and British business abroad. They are planning to lead at least 14 trade missions to 17 countries in the next year covering markets as diverse as Asia, Africa and the far east.

Mr. Wells: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the signal honour paid to him in being invited to India to take the Republic Day parade, on his flexibility in reorganising his schedule at the last minute to pay a visit to Saudi Arabia with business men accompanying him, and on obtaining a £4 billion order and securing 21,000 jobs, many of them in Hertford and Bishop's Stortford. Does he agree that, with the Budget increases to export credit guarantees of £1·2 billion and the favourable exchange rate, there are many more opportunities for our exporters to increase jobs and opportunities?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. The measures announced in the Budget will provide further export cover and cheaper export cover and that is on top of the changes previously made in the autumn statement. They will certainly help United Kingdom firms to win more business abroad and secure more jobs at home.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: Is the Prime Minister aware that the non-European Community deficit rose in February to £1·3 billion? Does he realise that photo opportunities and the ongoing pretence will not solve the basic problem in the British economic system? When will he tackle the real issues?

The Prime Minister: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman means about photo opportunities. I should have thought that 21,000 jobs and many billions of pounds worth of trade were a good deal more than that.

Engagements

Q2. Mrs. Browning: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mrs. Browning: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is most unfair that every household in my constituency is having to pay nearly £9 extra on the council tax because Liberal Democrat-controlled Torbay council and Labour-controlled Plymouth city council have set artificially low collection rates this year of under 92 per cent? If those councils cannot collect the rates, why should payers in Conservative-controlled East Devon have to pick up the tab?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I can see no practical justification for the low collection rates set by Torbay and Plymouth. They are unfair to the council tax payers and they are unfair to council tax payers throughout Devon. I am sure that my hon. Friend will not need reminding that for a band C property, Labour councils will cost the council tax payer £100 extra. For 6 May, the answer is clear—vote Conservative.

Mr. John Smith: Following the massive tax increases announced in the Budget for this year, next year and the year after, will the Prime Minister tell us whether there are any more tax increases in the pipeline?

The Prime Minister: This, of course, is from the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had plans to increase tax by £35 billion in his shadow Budget. I made it absolutely clear last week in the House that we do not like raising taxes and we do so only when necessary. The Labour party raises taxes because it wishes to spend other people's money on their behalf. We do it only when necessary.

Mr. John Smith: Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that it is he who has just raised taxes. Why on earth should anyone in this country believe what he says about future taxation when last week he broke clear pledges not to put VAT on gas and electricity and not to increase national insurance contributions? He made those pledges before the election. He broke them a year later.

The Prime Minister: As I indicated to the right hon. and learned Gentleman a moment ago, we increased indirect taxes because we felt that we had to in the interests of the economy. As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said,

"in good times the Tories will hope to cut taxes."

So we will and that is what the public expect of us. But perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman can explain how he would honour his manifesto commitment to increase child benefit and pensions if he would not put up taxes and he would not increase borrowing. Either he cannot add up or he has broken every single manifesto promise that he set out. Which is it? Is he innumerate or without principles?

Mr. John Smith: On the question of principles, does not the Prime Minister understand that this shameless Budget has put at issue two fundamental questions: first, the credibility of the Government and the Prime Minister himself, which is now in tatters; and, secondly, the deep unfairness of putting large increases on ordinary families to pay for his Government's mistakes? Does he not now realise that whatever he says about taxation in the future, no one will and no one should ever believe him?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's noble Friend Lord Desai has called for all zero-rate items to be subject to the full rate of value added tax—not just fuel, but transport, books, children's clothing and food. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman repudiate that policy expressed by his noble Friend—the Labour party's economic spokesman in another place?

Q3. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brandreth: In the light of Friday's debate on tourism, will my right hon. Friend join me in saluting the British tourist industry in general and the hoteliers of Chester in particular on taking full advantage of a competitive pound to bring good business to Britain and the best business to Chester? Of course, good news for Britain is very bad news for the monomaniacs of misery opposite.

The Prime Minister: I am happy to congratulate the British tourist industry on something like 18 million visitors to the United Kingdom last year. I have no doubt that, with the present competitive exchange rate, that figure will be well exceeded this year by the excellent British tourist industry in all parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jamieson: Will the Prime Minister join me in expressing our condolences to the parents and families of the four teenagers in my constituency who lost their lives yesterday in a tragic canoeing accident in Lyme bay? Will he ensure that the appropriate Government Department puts in place a full inquiry into how the tragedy took place and in particular why it took almost four hours for the emergency services to arrive on the scene?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly join my hon. Friend, as, I am sure, will every hon. Member in the House. Our hearts go out to the parents of all those who died in that tragic incident. I think that it would be wrong, at the moment, to speculate on the causes of the tragedy before the necessary inquiries have been completed. Local inquiries are under way already. The primary responsibility for safety in outdoor school activities lies with the local education authority, or the governing body in the case of grant-maintained schools. In this case, of course, it is Devon local education authority.

I must emphasise that there is no evidence at this stage that the necessary precautions were ignored. I have asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education to consider any action necessary by his Department in the light of this tragic event.

Q4. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend will be aware that leading members of Sinn Fein have said that they find it very difficult to justify any atrocities as bad as the one at Enniskillen in 1987.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that what limits the power of the Provisional IRA is both hard security and what their supporters are willing to tolerate? Will my right hon. Friend join me and people throughout these islands, in Ireland as well as in the United Kingdom, in condemning the kind of action that can kill a three-year-old and substitute bombs and bullets for arguments and for votes? Will he call on all people to try to persuade those still directing the violence to end it now?

The Prime Minister: I believe that decent families everywhere will have been sickened by that cold-blooded attack on innocent people going about peaceful business on a spring Saturday lunchtime. Even for the IRA, that attack plumbed the depths. To take the life of an innocent child in that fashion and to wreck other lives is absolutely unforgiveable. It was, quite literally, an evil act, made more evil in my judgment by messages deliberately designed to confuse those people who should have helped to prevent that incident from taking place. That behaviour has done one thing: it has provoked revulsion and determination that violence will not prevail.

I can assure my hon. Friend that no effort will be spared, within the rule of law, to bring the people responsible to justice. If there were a shred of humanity in the IRA they would hand over those killers for justice without delay. If they do not, as I fear they will not, I hope that they will know that we shall hound them for the rest of their days until we find them and punish them.

Mr. Hume: I agree with the Prime Minister and my constituents, who know exactly what the people of Warrington have experienced, will join totally with what he has just said.

Is the Prime Minister aware that the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, which is its public housing authority, has transformed public housing there over the past 20 years, in difficult circumstances, to the point where the Governments of the emergent democracies of eastern Europe are now coming to learn from them? Why have the Government begun the process of privatisation of that public authority and laying off the direct labour force, thus leaving unemployed people who are held in such high respect in our society? Given that his Government make so many efforts to reach agreement among the parties in Northern Ireland and that we are totally agreed on the subject, will the Prime Minister respond positively by keeping the housing executive and its direct labour force in existence?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's words about the disaster at Warrington. The whole House knows that he has had direct experience of these matters in the past and speaks with a special knowledge of the matter.

So far as the housing executive is concerned, the proposals made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State are made precisely because he believes that responsibility can be better carried out in another fashion. It is for that reason and for none other that he has proposed those changes.

Mr. Allason: My right hon. Friend will be aware that water rate payers in Torbay and in the rest of the south-west are facing increased charges of up to 16 per cent. in bills coming through their letter boxes this week. Does my right hon. Friend agree that much of this increase is due to a European directive? Will he also undertake to ensure that representations are made in Brussels to delay the implementation of the infrastructure investment that is being demanded of South West Water and is being put before the charge payers in the south-west?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend may be referring to the bathing water directive, which is, among other things, very important for the tourist industry. The essential reason for the very high bills in the south-west and in some other areas—and, as my hon. Friend will know, I am examining those at the moment—is the sheer scale of the investment in water and sewerage services which, frankly, was not made over the past 30 years in the public sector.

Q5. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The Prime Minister will have seen the disturbing scenes outside the Timex factory in my constituency yesterday. He will know that this has become a bitter dispute following the sacking by the management of 343 hourly paid employees. Those workers, many of whom are women, have 20 or 30 years' service to the company. That dispute went through the Government's employment legislation to the letter. I have asked the Secretary of State for Scotland and my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) and I have asked the Secretary of State for Employment and the Leader of the House to intervene personally, given that those workers have lost their jobs following the Government's employment legislation. Will the Prime Minister now intervene and ask the company to go to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service to settle this dispute now?

The Prime Minister: I note from the reports that none of the people arrested in the scenes at Timex yesterday were workers from Timex. I believe that the ex-convener at Timex said that those dismissed

"never called for a sit-down demonstration and . . . do not sponsor violence."

It seems that rent-a-picket is back and I do not think that that is in the interest of the Timex workers. Workers who choose to go on strike have always faced the risk of being dismissed without the right to claim unfair dismissal. That was the case under legislation enacted by the last Labour Government.

Police Reform

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): With permission, I should like to make a statement on the police.

The present framework for the management of the police service in England and Wales is based on the Police Act 1964. This has enabled us to deliver by and large a first-class police service over the last 30 years—a police service of which we are justly proud. However, 30 years is a long time. Society has changed in its attitudes and in its expectations. Crime has increased in absolute terms and in terms of its sophistication. In order to strengthen the ability of our police forces to respond to today's demands, I have undertaken a review of the existing system. I should like to outline to the House in broad terms how I propose to improve the police service.

We all want the police to be able to provide the best possible service—no one more so than police officers themselves. We want the police to protect the public, to prevent crime, and to tackle crime effectively when it occurs. The police must respond to the needs of local communities and of the victims of crime and use to maximum effect the £6 billion which they spend every year. What we need are the conditions in which the men and women of the police service can give of their best.

That means: giving police authorities and police forces greater freedom to decide for themselves how best to spend their money; creating more powerful and businesslike police authorities which will give more leadership to the local police service and ensure that money is spent more effectively; creating a new police authority for the Metropolitan police in line with the new national pattern, thereby strengthening local accountability in the capital.

It also means setting key national objectives for police activity; complementing local objectives agreed by the police authority; measuring performance against these objectives and publishing the results so that the public know what their force has delivered and how well their police force is doing compared to others; reforming the funding arrangements to get the best out of the money spent on policing; and simplifying the procedures for forces to be amalgamated when the time is right.

I am sure the House will agree that the principle of operational independence must remain. No Home Secretary and no police authority must be able to direct a chief constable in the conduct of any investigation or in the handling of an operation. While maintaining that principle of operational independence, we need to make a fundamental shift in the relationship between the Home Office and local police forces—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Running commentaries are not necessary.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): He is forcing coppers to vote Labour.

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr. Secretary Clarke.

Mr. Clarke: I do not believe that, if the hon. Gentleman listened, he would change his opinions on the subject in any way whatsoever, so he can carry on talking to himself if he wishes.

I have always believed that organisations run better when responsibility is devolved to local managers. The current financial arrangements shackle police forces. Far too often, decisions that could and should be taken locally are referred upwards.

Chief constables will in future have greater freedom to manage their resources. In consultation with their local police authority, they will be able to decide on the right mix of manpower and equipment needed to meet local needs. They may need more constables on the beat, or more civilian staff to free police officers from administrative paperwork. They may need police cars or computers. In future, the choice will be theirs. That means that the current Home Office control on police manpower will cease, and so will all but the largest capital projects.

At the same time, in order to manage this new freedom, I propose to strengthen local police authorities and give them greater autonomy. They will have responsibility for the performance of their force, and I will hold them to account for the results. Their job will be to ensure that policing responds to local needs and concerns. I will expect police authorities to build on their existing statutory responsibility to consult local people in setting the local policing agenda.

Police authorities need to change to fulfil their new responsibilities. Police authorities should have many fewer members and be more businesslike bodies. There should be broader local representation in their membership, including local people with relevant management experience. I propose that half of the membership should be elected local councillors. The remaining half should be partly local magistrates and partly local people nominated by the Home Secretary on the basis of their knowledge and experience [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—Wait for it. The chairman of the police authority will be nominated by the Home Secretary from among the overall membership—[Interruption.]—and the current Home Secretary will be less obsessed by the political complexion of the appointees than hon. Members opposite.

I have also re-examined the role of the Home Secretary in relation to the Metropolitan police. I propose to establish for the first time a police authority for the Metropolitan police on the new national model separate from the Home Office and with essentially the same tasks as police authorities elsewhere.

Greater freedom to manage must go hand in hand with clearer means of calling police authorities and police forces to account. I propose to take a power to prescribe national objectives for the police service. I will also expect police authorities to set local performance targets. The results will be published, so that comparisons can be made between forces. This will build on the current drive within the police service for better quality of service.

The present funding arrangements for the police are unsatisfactory. They are cumbersome, without giving any effective control of overall expenditure. The present system, for example, encourages the increase of police rather than civilian manpower, and there are no incentives to ensure that the best use is made of resources.

I propose to continue with a joint funding arrangement, with central and local government meeting police authority costs broadly in the same proportions as they do now. All police authorities will in future be constituted as free-standing precepting bodies. The central Government contribution will be set at the level necessary to secure an effective police service. It will in future be cash-limited. The local contribution will be subject to the overall controls on local expenditure.

One of my principal objectives behind these structural changes is to encourage devolution of responsibility within police forces to local police units, which will be directly accountable to their local communities. Half the forces in the country, including the Metropolitan police, are already cutting out unnecessary headquarters and management tiers and giving more responsibility to local commanders. As the focus of policing is increasingly shifted from headquarters to local units, the role of the force headquarters will change. They should become co-ordinators and supporters of local activity, rather than the commanders of local policing.

As a result, we may no longer need 43 separate headquarters maintaining 43 parallel organisations. I have no fixed views about what the right number of forces should be, and I have no plans to use the powers in the Police Act 1964 to amalgamate forces, but I propose that the statutory procedures, which are unduly cumbersome, should be simplified to allow for amalgamation when the time is right.

The House will be aware of the inquiry under the chairmanship of Sir Patrick Sheehy, which is examining police rank structure, pay and conditions of service and is expected to report in May. I will also be issuing shortly a separate consultation document on radical changes to the disciplinary system. Shift systems and training are being overhauled throughout the service. Those and the other changes that I have announced today extend the principles of the citizens charter through the police service and will complement the wider reforms to police structure and organisation. Together, they will constitute the most important reform of the police service for 30 years.

Over the next few months, I will be developing my proposals in more detail. During that period, we will be happy to continue to listen to all views. I will then publish a White Paper and legislate when parliamentary time allows.

My aim, above all, will be to help the police service help us to build a safer and securer society. We must ask what difference we intend our reforms to make to the ordinary man in the street. The answer must be to make his street safer. I commend that objective and the means to achieve it to the House.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): First, there is no dispute that a change in policing is necessary: the issue is what type of change. I shall deal in turn with each principal matter that the Home Secretary raised.

I welcome the change in the method of calculating public funding, which is long overdue and which will replace a system that discouraged efficiency and was far too cumbersome and centralised. Will the changes in funding lead to a change in the resources needed to do the job? Can I urge the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if anything, to go further on the changes, and to ensure that much greater local autonomy is given to police services to decide how they spend their money and what it is spent on? Does he agree that there is a need for greater flexibility and less bureaucracy not merely in financing, but also in the ability of police authorities and chief constables to introduce the changes within police forces which present regulations prevent them from doing?

There was a short paragraph in the Home Secretary's statement on amalgamations. Can we be clear exactly what he is proposing, since both the amalgamations and the composition of police authorities bear all the hallmarks of the worst kind of Cabinet compromise? May I at least welcome what I assume to be his backing away from a headlong rush into bigger police forces, but can we be clear —I hope that he will answer this specifically—that the proposals for an enforced reduction in the number of forces from 43 to 25 or 23, which were widely leaked from his Department, will be permanently shelved and that there will be no compulsory amalgamations?

The Home Secretary said that he will retain the powers of amalgamation under the Police Act 1964. Am I right in saying that those powers include a power for him to order amalgamations of police forces if he wants to? Perhaps he will confirm that to the House. Since he has presumably thought about the subject during the past few months, will he tell us his intentions? Does he or does he not intend to amalgamate police forces? The House needs to be told.

Given that the Home Secretary is on record as saying that he believes that there are too many police forces, will he confirm that there is no evidence to suggest that bigger forces mean better service? Indeed, such evidence as there is suggests the opposite—that smaller forces provide as good a service and as high standards of operational efficiency as larger ones, and are closer to the local community.

We certainly welcome the creation of a police authority for London—a big change in policy. However, would it not be better to have a properly elected authority for London which is fully accountable to the people of London? If the Home Secretary and his colleagues are now admitting that a strategic authority for London is right for policing, what possible case can they have for refusing a strategic authority for London for all the services in our capital city?

Does the Home Secretary accept that the fact that he is to appoint the chairman of the police authority and at least a substantial number of its members will mean a significant shift in power from local people to the Home Office? No doubt the Home Secretary will say—as he always does—that local councillors are not well known as members of the police authority.

Let us look at what the Home Secretary proposes. Does he believe that the chairman or managing director of a company, who is perhaps already on a training and enterprise council, regional health authority and heaven knows what else, and who is having to cope with the recession, is more in tune with local feelings than local councillors, who live locally, have to experience the menace of crime locally and are elected by local people?

Who will appoint the new members of the authority? Not the local people, not the police authority, but the Home Secretary, sitting behind a desk in Whitehall. What sort of local accountability is that? Is it not high time that Government policy on policing ceased to be driven by an extreme, ill-judged and damaging prejudice against local government, which is a slur on Conservative and Labour councillors alike?

The proposals as a whole suggest the possibility of larger and more remote police forces, a Government-appointed chairman, Government appointees replacing local representatives. Are we not going too far down the road towards centralised policing that will be out of touch with, and out of the reach of, ordinary people? We need to travel in the opposite direction, with more policemen and women on the beat, more local policing and a greater partnership between the police and the local community.

[Mr. Tony Blair]

Does not the Home Secretary understand that, at a time when crime is running out of control in many parts of Britain and burglary, theft, criminal damage and other crimes of violence make life hell for many ordinary people in our local communities, the public want the Government to concentrate their energy on those issues? The Home Secretary would gain greater support if he spent less time attacking the responsibilities of the police and police authorities, and more time discharging the responsibilities of government.

Mr. Clarke: I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) agrees that change is necessary in the police force. He has not yet advocated any change, but when he has had the chance to study what I have said, I think that he will find that there is more with which he can agree beyond that which I am glad to say he has already agreed to and welcomed.

I made the statement in advance of the White Paper that I have always proposed because of the debate currently running about the changes that I was supposed to be proposing. That debate runs far wide of what I am actually proposing. When he studies my proposals, the hon. Gentleman will see that I am certainly not suggesting the centralisation of the police service, any more than I would propose the centralisation of any other service.

I am the first Home Secretary to say that I propose to shed responsibility for the Metropolitan police. I propose to give more autonomy to local police authorities—a move welcomed by the hon. Gentleman, as it will be welcomed by the police service generally. I propose to give local police authorities much more freedom to use the resources that they are given. I also propose fundamentally to alter the relationship between the Home Office and the local authorities, but in quite a different—although important—way from that feared by the hon. Gentleman.

Instead of the Home Office being responsible for detailed day-to-day supervision of what every police authority does—almost the only dialogue that exists between the Home Office and counties at present is on issues such as whether or not I agree to let them have more police officers—I propose to give police authorities the money and the freedom to spend it and to set standards, and then hold those authorities to account. That is the fundamental change which I trust that the hon. Gentleman, on reflection, will come to welcome.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about amalgamations. I make no secret of the fact that, as part of the process of developing neighbourhood policing, one element that we propose to use to speed up that process will be that the nature of the police headquarters will change. They will become smaller and more supportive; they will not be involved in the day-to-day managing of policing. People want the police in their neighbourhood to be run by a local police commander in a nearby headquarters.

That is why Paul Condon, the new commissioner that I have appointed to the Metropolitan police, almost immediately decided to move 700 people from headquarters out into the divisions doing the policing. When that change takes place, there will be pressure for amalgamations. The present statutory process is not good enough to achieve them, so I propose to simplify the process.

I have not studied the maps; I have no view on whether Wiltshire police should or should not amalgamate. The time has come, however, to turn to more important matters such as those on which I am concentrating in these reforms.

The Opposition only appear to come to life when we ask whether Labour councillors should dominate the membership of police authorities. I am going to set up a new police authority for London which will have, if we follow the national model, about half its members drawn from local government under a process that we have yet to consult on. If we decided to have an elected police authority for London, my guess is that the hon. Member for Sedgefield would be even more worried than I. The idea of his friends in Lambeth, Southwark and Camden serving on the police authority would keep him lying awake at night.

We are talking about setting up stronger police authorities, taking half their membership from local government and half appointed for the qualities that they can bring to the service—qualities that might not be contributed by those who happened to emerge from local authorities or from magistrates.

The result will be authorities that are more visible, that can take on more responsibility for their local services and that can be held to account by the Home Secretary.—[Interruption.] That is an improvement on the present. It is all very well Opposition Members baying their support for what they have. Most of their constituents do not know who their police authority is or what it does. A recent newspaper poll showed that nine out of 10 people think that the Home Secretary runs their local police service; only one in 10 know that it is supposed to be a local authority responsibility.

I think that the local councillors on the new authorities that I propose will find that they are in a more responsible position to contribute more to police work in their new role. I also think that this is an altogether more sensible structure to achieve what we all want, which is a better managed and directed police service, achieving higher standards in making our streets safe and combating crime. That is what the reforms will bring about.

Madam Speaker: Order. The exchanges between the Minister and the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman have taken up rather more than 20 minutes. I shall now require hon. Members to carry out our procedures. That means not making statements but putting direct questions to the Secretary of State.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Since we now have more police with more powers, better pay, better equipment and better training, yet crime is rising and the number of arrests is falling, is it not obvious that the next stage must be some structural rearrangement to make the police force more efficient and effective and to give people better value for money? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that what our constituents really want is a more localised police force, with a local police chief who is identifiable and who can make decisions that are important to his locality? Is he aware that those constituents will welcome the proposals as a sensible step forward?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. Police manpower is up by 30,000 compared with when we came to power. We spend 81 per cent. more in real terms on the police than our predecessors did. We have a much better police service than we had when we took office. But plainly, our response to the pressures cannot simply be to argue about how many more men and how much more money. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend was right: Staffordshire will welcome the fact that its chief constable will no longer need my permission to recruit police officers. He will be free to make his own judgments about what he wants to spend from the resources he gets, and he will be more visibly accountable for the standards of performance he achieves.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I acknowledge that the unprecedented spiralling upwards of crime makes the continuation of the examination of the future structure, funding and objectives of the police natural and proper. However, does the Home Secretary accept that this is a peculiarly ill-digested approach to reform, dribbling out some half thought out proposals, allegedly strengthening local autonomy while actually increasing the power of the Secretary of State over appointments to police authorities, laying down national objectives and, in other words, taking into his own hands direct responsibility for the policing of the country, which hitherto has been shared around the country? Does he also accept that the local objectives of the police can be measured only if they are following a pattern proposed by the local authorities, and that proper comparisons between authorities will not be made any easier by the manner of his imposition of national objectives?

Mr. Clarke: I think that the hon. Gentleman is expressing fears about what he thought I was going to say, without having digested what I actually said. We are not dribbling anything out. By the summer, we shall have the report of Sir Patrick Sheehy and his team on the leadership, pay, terms and conditions of the police service. We shall have the White Paper that I propose on new structure, new financing, more autonomy and stronger police authorities, held more openly accountable for what they achieve. We shall have the new proposals on police discipline to complement what I have already done on dealing with the incapability procedures, as they are called, for police officers who simply do not come up to the job.

As soon as I can manage thereafter, we shall move on to legislation, in the light of the consultation on all that, aimed at trying to get a stronger police service. Faced with that, the hon. Gentleman's meanderings through the subject, exploring what changes might or might not be needed, did not match the urgency of the task, which is to tackle today's levels of crime by a stronger and more effective police service.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the key to his objectives, as announced today, is a stronger police system, leading to a better control and the reduction in crime that the public wish to see tackled? Does he further agree that the character and nature of the police authority has to model those objectives, and that the chief officer of police will have to remain operationally independent, as he or she has always been, and that the police system has never been part of the local government structure in the manner of an environmental health department?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with all those points, and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the contribution that he makes to debates on the subject, now as at other stages. I know his opinions well, because I have consulted him closely throughout, and I know that he thinks that I am being nervous in the extent to which I have so far contemplated change. Nevertheless, I hope that I have his support for what I have announced, in that it is going in the right direction. He underlined some key principles on getting stronger accountability for the police service.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I am certain that the Home Secretary will join me and the House in condemning the murder of the police sergeant in my constituency on Saturday night. In that context, will he tell the House how his proposals to introduce business men on to police authorities will get more policemen on the beat when they are needed, where they are needed and at the time they are needed? How will authorities be able to afford those policemen, given the financial constraints that he has announced and the existing tax capping of local authorities?

Mr. Clarke: I said that the authorities should be more businesslike, in that their job is to take decisions about priorities and spend the money effectively. It is by no means the case that I will appoint only business men. The approach that I shall adopt to such appointments will be to see who, by chance, emerges from the local authority side of the membership and who emerges from the magistrates' side of the membership, and then to decide what individual skills and abilities need to be appointed to make a strong, all right authority to complete the total. We shall then choose a chairman—a local councillor, a magistrate or one of my appointees. That is how we shall go about it.

I agree that the key question here, as it is about everything that happens in any headquarters, however it is administered, is what that means on the ground. It should mean that the headquarters listens more closely to local opinion, which will say that it wants more officers on the ground, a more visible presence, prompt replies to 999 calls, a good level of detection and success when investigating crime in the locality. We shall measure performance in all those sectors.

The police officer on the beat, in the exposed position described by the hon. Gentleman, will know more clearly what is expected of him, will know that the person directly in charge of him has far more responsibility for how things are organised, and will know that his performance will be measured according to his success in creating the good relationship with his locality and in delivering the kind of the results the people want.

Many policemen will find that more attractive than some of the 43 headquarters that we have at the moment, because it is a fair criticism that some police officers would make that we have a top-heavy structure dotted around the country in far too many places.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): As a former policeman and the father of a policeman, I can tell my right hon. and learned Friend that this is the best news that the police have had for many a year. Does he agree that, when his proposals come into effect, they will expose those police authorities that are not up to the job, but police authorities such as North Yorkshire, which do an excellent job, will warmly welcome the ability to spend their money more wisely and to deliver a more effective police service?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I share his opinion on the likely response, not least in North Yorkshire, which has shown itself to be a go-ahead force, where the chief constable has introduced many changes, and regards itself as continually trying to enhance the service to the population it serves. It has not shied away from change in order to do so, and I hope that it will find that my proposals go very much with the grain of what a force such as North Yorkshire has been doing.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement that he would tell the House "how I propose to improve" the police service must have sent shivers down the spine of the police service, coming as it did from a former Secretary of State for Health who said that he would improve the health service and left it demoralised and inefficient, and from a former Secretary of State for Education who said that he would improve the education service——

Hon. Members: He did.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have already cautioned the House that I am becoming a little intolerant in the way in which statements are put to Secretaries of State. I want questions, not long statements.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman: Absolutely, Madam Speaker.

——and left the education service inefficient and demoralised? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain how that fiddling and meddling interference with democratic structures and bringing in his own nominees will solve or prevent one more crime?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman belongs to that generation of the Labour movement which became so reactionary that it resisted any change of any kind to any public service. I am only glad that he never had the opportunity to try to improve the foreign policy of this country.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that greater autonomy for chief constables to spend resources as they think fit in consultation with the new stronger police authorities will be most welcome, and will make a considerable contribution towards the improvement of the police service? What does my right hon. and learned Friend have in mind with regard to the radical changes, as he describes them, in disciplinary procedures? Is he aware that such procedures are a matter of great concern to the police? Can he give the House an assurance that there will be no lowering of the standard of proof in cases which involve dismissal?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my hon. Friend, with his knowledge of the police service, is right when he says that greater autonomy will be widely welcomed. One of the things that chief constables complain to me about all the time is that, if they reorganise their headquarters and dispense with a post of chief superintendent, they can appoint only one constable in his place because of the Home Office controls on overall numbers. That is an absurdity, which, with many others, will be swept away by my proposals.

Discipline is an important matter, which is why I announced today that I shall be publishing a consultation document specifically on that subject. Disciplinary procedures, particularly in the more serious complaints against police officers, are legalistic and take a great deal of time. Cases come to me years after the incident complained of, the police officers in question suffer the unbelievable stress of being suspended while their cases are considered, and the outcome is often so long after the event that it is regarded as unsatisfactory by the complainant and everybody else. Those important matters need to be approached by a less legalistic, convoluted and lengthy process, but obviously it must be fair, and it must be widely acceptable within the service.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Now that the Home Secretary has accepted the principle of a police authority for London, why does he not go a step further and allow the people of London to elect all the members of that authority through an elected authority for London as a whole? It cannot be right in a democratic society for half the members of a police authority to be appointed directly by the Home Secretary.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman and I both believe in democracy, but we do not see it in exactly the same way. The House is an elected House, but it does not manage anything except the Palace of Westminster—which, it could be argued, it does not manage very well. It is an elected body to which those who are responsible for various Departments are answerable and accountable. I do not believe that, in the case of local services, putting people in elected positions to run the management and be solely responsible for day-to-day decisions in the police service is the best way of proceeding.

I also think, without repeating what I said to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), that there would be peculiar difficulties in allowing some of the elected representatives of London loose on the police service. They have hardly been an all-fire success in running the services for which they are already responsible, in Lambeth, Southwark, Camden and elsewhere.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): The keynote of what my right hon. and learned Friend said was his comment that he wanted the police to be more powerful and businesslike —I think we would all applaud that—but being more powerful and businesslike does not necessarily mean being larger. A police force like the Dorset police force—which is small, extremely efficient, very powerful and already businesslike—would, I hope, escape his attention. On a slightly lighter note, could I say to my right hon. and learned Friend that he might consider instituting annual fitness as opposed to health checks for all members of police forces?

Mr. Clarke: As I have made clear, I have no views on whether the Dorest force is or is not the right size. I have not even begun to look at amalgamation. I think some amalgamations will be required, and I propose to simplify the procedure. I prefer to approach these things from the bottom up. The first thing to get right is the local command and the organisation and distribution of officers in a particular neighbourhood, with the person who is clearly in charge given more autonomy. Above that there will be smaller headquarters, whose role will be to lead and support those on the ground in specialist ways and hold them to account for their performance. That will cause us to readdress the present imbalance in the distribution of police forces, which is largely historic. In some cases they match the counties; in others they do not. In some cases they have local government representatives on the police authority; in London they do not.

What will emerge is that we will have fewer headquarters eventually, but it is a second order question. The first things to get right are the structure, the standards we need to set, the way in which we are to hold people accountable, how to delegate responsibility further down the chain, how to get more resources and manpower deployed where it matters most, on the ground actually fighting crime. I think it is likely that thereafter people will come to me stressing the need for amalgamations to avoid duplicating headquarters functions in different existing forces.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): May I tell the Home Secretary that his proposals for so-called businesslike police authorities, with Government-appointed chairs, will go down like a lead balloon in the west midlands, where we have seen similar leadership by Government-appointed business men? Sir James Ackers's leadership of the health authority led to the wasting of millions of pounds, was a complete shambles, showed a lack of concern about public opinion and has resulted in a lack of confidence in the west midlands in an authority appointed in that way.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain how his proposals will help authorities such as those in the west midlands to be more vigilant over the practices operated by senior police officers which have led in the past to scandals such as those involving the serious crime squad? In my view it is exacerbated by an unelected component of the police authority—the magistrates—and has led to a lack of grip by police authority members over their affairs——

Madam Speaker: Order. I call the Secretary of State.

Mr. Clarke: First, I propose to appoint men and women to be chairmen of authorities. I do not propose to appoint anybody to be a chair. It is also a rather extraordinary theory, which I will listen to at greater length on a more suitable occasion, that it is the magistrate members of the west midlands police authority who are responsible for the difficulties that have occurred in relation to the serious crime squad in the west midlands under the existing structure.

Sir James Ackers did an extremely good job as chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority. He presided over the most dramatic capital programme throughout the region, which transformed the region's health services for the better in comparison to the work of the old regional health authority before he took over. It is churlish of the hon. Lady to describe his performance in the way she did.

Sir George Gardiner (Reigate): In his search for a more rational and devolved policing structure, which I am sure most of us would totally support, is my right hon. and learned Friend prepared to consider submissions from people like many of my constituents who find themselves on the fringe of the Metropolitan police area and would very much prefer to be policed by their own county constabulary?

Mr. Clarke: I am prepared to consider such submissions from my hon. Friend or anyone else. I have a completely open mind about that. I expect that, once we move towards setting up new police authorities, I will receive many representations from the home counties about precisely where the borders of those police authorities should run.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I noticed that the Home Secretary said that he will hold local police authorities accountable. Does that mean that he will follow the example of one of his right hon. Friends, who removed local councillors from a police authority because they dared to disagree with civil servants? Does the Home Secretary accept that there cannot be effective local accountability unless the local councillor representatives on the authority are appointed, and can be removed, by the local authority and are hence accountable to the people in the locality?

Mr. Clarke: Half the membership will come from local government. A particular problem in England and Wales is that we are currently embarking on a process of local government reorganisation. Alongside the process of police reform, which will essentially be governed by policing requirements, we will see a changing pattern of local government across the country. It is difficult to predict exactly who the local authority members will be and from where they will be drawn, but half of them will be elected local councillors.

However, for reasons that I have already given, I do not think we can have in any part of England completely elected local authorities which, at the same time, can enjoy all the autonomy that I am proposing. It is essential to have the right strength and authority to handle the freedom that authorities have to spend the resources as they think best. It is also essential that the Home Secretary of the day holds the authorities to account for national standards.

In turn, the Home Secretary is, of course, accountable to the House. I can always be questioned about policing methods. Given that I provide 90 per cent. of the money on behalf of central Government and that nine out of 10 people think that I run their local police service, it is time that I held those authorities to account for performance and was then held to account by this House.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that we must produce a country that is safe for children, women and the elderly? His statement offers quite good prospects for that. However, does he also agree that the criminal of today is much more mobile because of the motor car and that there is therefore a very good case to be made for regional police headquarters, although of course it is nice to have local accountability?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. We must bear it in mind that criminals do not always have the regard for local authority boundaries that some people wish they would have. Their organisation and equipment are also sometimes extremely sophisticated. We must therefore ensure that the police are that bit more sophisticated.

[Mr. Clarke]

We are now organising large regional crime squads precisely to handle large scale organised crime. It is essential that we do that. It is also essential that the police are organised so that they can match up on the right scale to the threat that they face as a contribution to making the country safer, which, as my hon. Friend says, is undoubtedly our priority.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Walsend): Does not the Home Secretary recognise that the new powers he intends to give to the holder of his office will be a dramatic extension of Whitehall control over a crucial local service? Is he not aware that his statement will be seen in many quarters as a damaging distraction from the real battle against the rise in crime? Does not he accept that, at a time when what we really need is an active partnership between local authorities, the local community and the police, his statement will be seen as a triumph of political dogma over reason?

Mr. Clarke: I understand that the hon. Gentleman's experience relates more to education than to policing. Thus, when he says that I am talking about a great extension of Whitehall power, he may not appreciate that I am solely the police authority for London, as all my predecessors have been. There is absolutely no local government contribution to the discharge of that responsibility.

The hon. Gentleman may also be unaware of the fact that, outside London, I determine exactly how many police officers may or may not be employed in every county and that, through my office, I exercise the most detailed control over the investment split between manpower and various types of equipment. All that I am proposing to forgo. With the greater devolution of responsibility, some attention must be paid to the strength of the police authorities that are being given more autonomy and to the way in which they are to be held to account for their performance.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I thank my hon. and learned Friend for his statement. As someone who was a member of a police authority for some years, I believe that this is a move in the right direction. When does my right hon. and learned Friend hope to produce the White Paper? Will it be possible to have a debate on it before the recess? Who does my right hon. and learned Friend think will initiate any amalgamations? I am very nervous about the suggestion that there should necessarily be large-scale amalgamations, and I am very relieved that my right hon. and learned Friend has not announced a low number of forces.

Mr. Clarke: I hope to produce the White Paper in June, by which time I hope the report of Sir Patrick Sheehy and his group will have been published. I understand that Sir Patrick is trying to achieve publication a little earlier. I hope that, when the White Paper is published, consultations concerning disciplinary procedures and so on will be well advanced. I understand that there may well be demands for a debate. As my hon. Friend will know, however, I am not responsible for the disposition of parliamentary time—I am extremely glad that I have no such responsibility at the moment. However, I look forward as much as my hon. Friend to a debate at a convenient time.

We have still to have consultations about what I have described as the new, simplified amalgamation process. There must be some power to initiate discussions about amalgamations, apart from the question of locality. I remember quite well the last occasion, in the early 1960s, on which this question arose. At that time, nobody was in favour of amalgamation anywhere, and all proposed amalgamations were fought like mad. If one were to consult a map of the then police force areas of the United Kingdom, one would realise that nobody would dream of re-fighting many of the battles that were fought to keep small local forces.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does not the Home Secretary admit that his reason for bringing these proposals forward today has more to do with his position and the Tory Cabinet shuffle than with anything else? Can he give a guarantee that anyone he appoints will not be associated with freemasonry? How did Sir Patrick Sheehy get this job? He is only a tobacconist. What are his qualifications?

Mr. Clarke: Sir Patrick Sheehy is altogether more experienced in management and in the running of large organisations than either the hon. Gentleman or myself. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not asked any question about the police—in particular, the Derbyshire police.

A key fact arising from the changes in funding is that, in future, police authorities will be free-standing bodies, so there will not be the virement to or from police funding, vis-a-vis other local services, that takes place at present. Thus, for example, in Derbyshire it will not be possible for what I hope will be the successor body to the Derbyshire county council to reduce spending on police—to spend less than the Government think it should spend—and to use the money to subsidise school meals and charge artificially low prices. This will result in a big improvement in the management of policing in Derbyshire, where improvement is very necessary.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): What effect does my right hon. and learned Friend think his statement will have on overall police numbers? Can he confirm that, in future, chief constables will have much greater freedom to appoint more officers and much greater freedom in the selection of equipment, such as the side-handled baton?

Mr. Clarke: The level of police manpower will be much more determined by the decision of chief constables themselves. As they receive increased funding, which undoubtedly they will, they will determine the distribution of expenditure between manpower and equipment. In some cases, that will lead to big increases in manpower but not necessarily in all. One reason why the only dialogue that takes place between most politicians locally and most Home Secretaries at the moment is about whether they can have more police officers is because the present system works on the basis that one can have more money for a police force only if the Home Secretary can be persuaded that more police officers are needed. If we just gave them the money, some chief constables would spend it on capital, kit and even new buildings, and not just on police officers. Overall manpower will be determined in future by more local operational judgment of the relative importance of manpower vis-a-vis other expenditure.

We are testing new types of baton. While I am anxious to improve the protection of the police, I continue to be very sceptical about the side-handled baton, which is so visible and such an aggressive-looking weapon that it would be a significant step to start introducing it as part of the uniform of British police officers. It would not exactly be like arming them with firearms, but it would be a step away from the tradition of the unarmed police and the non-aggressive-looking figure that we have on the streets at the moment.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): In Wales, what consultations has the right hon. and learned Gentleman had with magistrates, councillors and police, bearing in mind the linguistic, geographical and cultural differences from England? Has he guaranteed today more police for Wales, bearing in mind the crime wave that is sweeping the Principality? The Secretary of State for Wales's appointments to hospital trusts generated a great deal of controversy. Will the Home Secretary bear in mind the need to be very even-handed? We do not want more Tory placemen in Wales.

Mr. Clarke: There will be a full process of consultation in Wales as elsewhere. I will certainly pay regard to the distinctive features of Wales in carrying out that consultation. I have already had meetings with south Walian leaders of the police service in respect of other matters causing controversy there, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will also be involved in the process.

As for appointments, one effect of moving police authorities a bit further away from being a committee of the local council will be, in my opinion, to depoliticise to some extent the day-to-day running of the service. Indeed, it is that which often causes the initial outbursts of rage among Opposition Members. I too have made appointments to hospital trusts. I have appointed quite a number of ex-Labour MPs in my time, and certainly quite a lot of Labour supporters

We have moved on from this rather ridiculous canard where Opposition Members can only wonder, when we mention appointments, whether they are of their political colour or ours. We have been in government for longer, and we are more responsible about these matters than our opponents plainly would be, if they had the chance.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): If my right hon. and learned Friend is, quite rightly, going to give far more responsibility to chief constables, should he not at the same time make it easier to get rid of those few who may prove to be not up to the job?

Mr. Clarke: That runs from top to bottom of the police service, as it unfortunately does in any other walk of life, which is why I have more or less finalised proposals, for the lower ranks, for changes to the incapability procedures, as people insist on calling them, which is a way of bringing to an end, in a civilised fashion, the service of someone who is no longer up to being a good officer.

At the top of the police service at the moment we have again long and convoluted procedures if ever one wished to remove somebody, and I will look at them alongside my consideration of the disciplinary procedures. I am sure that Sir Patrick Sheehy is also considering representations made to him about putting very senior police officers on fixed-term contracts. I recently appointed a new Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis who raised not the slightest objection to being placed on a fixed-term contract.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Has the Home Secretary any plans to address the high incidence of freemasons in the police force? I see him smile, but it is so corrosive of public confidence and so deeply resented by honest police officers.

Mr. Clarke: I am not a freemason, and I know little about freemasonry. My general view is that it is entirely a matter for individuals whether they are freemasons or not, and I have absolutely no views about whether police officers should be freemasons, as long as nobody uses that membership or anything else improperly in the course of his or her duties.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): If my right hon. and learned Friend's announcement today means that we may get back a Coventry and Warwickshire police force, it will be warmly welcomed by my constituents. My right hon. and learned Friend is under great pressure to do something about juvenile crime and about unpicking the defects of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. What will he see as his first priority in the limited legislative time available to him?

Mr. Clarke: I remember the controversy about the Coventry and Warwickshire police force many years ago. We may or may not see that reopened. I did not realise that those passions still ran high.

So far as legislative time is concerned, I have a large number of proposals which, in due course, will occupy some legislative time in the House. But that will be when time allows, and those matters are not within my control.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I give the Home Secretary half a cheer for introducing a new police authority for London, and remind him of how he used to get his truncheon in a twist when Labour Members suggested that he should no longer be the police authority for London?

When he considers the new police authority for London, will the Home Secretary take into acount London's unique policing role, having to pay for protection of diplomatic services, the royal family, Parliament and so on? In his new proposals for the police authority, will the City of London police authority be assumed into the new authority?

Mr. Clarke: First, I do not recall ever getting passionate in defence of my role as the policy authority for London. I announced today that I have concluded that my office and I should not continue to be the police authority for London. It would be better to have a clearly distinct police authority of the sort which I have described.

While I envisage an authority on the national model, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that more consideration needs to be given as part of the consultation to what I might call the national and distinctive functions of the capital's police force, such as diplomatic protection, which are not shared elsewhere.

[Mr. Clarke]

I have forgotten the hon. Gentleman's final point. [HON. MEMBERS: "The City of London."] I have no views on amalgamations at any stage.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the chairman of Leicestershire police authority is both an elected Conservative county councillor and a successful business man and, as a result, has probably saved the force a lot of money and made it more effective? Is he also aware that, as a Leicestershire Member, I must deal with different police authorities but that the response I get from the smaller Leicestershire authority about constituents' problems is better than that of the larger west midlands authority? Will he take that into consideration?

Finally, is not the most significant part of the statement the determination to improve the control and management structure which runs down through the ranks? If that is implemented, it will not be necessary to amalgamate the police forces because, with improved communications——

Hon. Members: Come on.

Madam Speaker: Yes, come along, quickly.

Mr. Tredinnick: ——it will do the trick.

Mr. Clarke: I accept that quite a few local authority elected councillors have considerable business and other skills. Quite a few magistrates have business and other skills. On each individual police authority, the specific mix which emerges is sometimes a matter of chance. There are some police authorities where there is simply not a strong enough or wide enough spread of membership emerging in that way and, for that, appointments can fill in the gap.

I take on board my hon. Friend's view on the performance of police authorities and the desirable size of them. Whether or not the Leicestershire police force combines with the police force in Nottinghamshire, for example, is a matter on which I have absolutely no views. There might be resistance to it on both sides of the border.

I look forward to seeing a comparison between those extremely similar forces on such matters as the response to 999 calls, clear-up rates, number of police officers per 1,000 population deployed on the ground, number of complaints successfully sustained and so on, because the two police forces are roughly comparable. It would be a great advantage to all of us, in holding our police service up to the mark, to see how Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire and, dare I add, Derbyshire compare in all those respects so far as their performance is concerned.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Home Secretary not see that the problem with the Leicestershire police force and, I am sure, many other police forces which do an excellent job is that they are overworked and underfunded, and that what matters is that they should have the resources to do their job? Does he accept that a force which is undermanned and under-resourced cannot possibly hope to meet the crime wave, whether under the present system or under the one which he proposes, and that we need money and men and women on the beat?

Mr. Clarke: I hope that we will move the whole debate on public services on from that—I carefully persuade myself that we are slowly beginning to do that. Of course, if we ask anybody in any walk of life about their job, they will tell us that they are underpaid and overworked. It has long been a tradition in the United Kingdom that, whenever anybody seeks an improvement in public services, they get back a litany of complaints about underfunding and undermanning.

We have poured manpower and funding into the police service. The police service in Leicestershire is not underfunded or undermanned. It is a perfectly decent police service. We are looking at ways of enhancing its performance, the use of its resources, the value for money we get and keeping it up to ever higher targets.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): While I welcome the bulk of my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals, does he accept that there is concern that in his mind fewer somehow means bigger and bigger somehow means better? Does he accept that smaller forces such as Wiltshire provide better value for money per officer and a better clear-up rate than many of their larger counterparts? Will he assure the House that he will allow his performance and objective exercise to proceed before he considers amalgamations, so that he does not throw out valuable babies such as Wiltshire with the bath water?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad that my hon. Friend, in seeking to defend the present size of the Wiltshire force, is content to look to its performance. It is obvious that the case for change in a police force which can demonstrate that it is achieving high standards by national standards will not be strong. The force will be able to make the best possible case for its retention. I believe that, for the day-to-day management of the police service, small-scale, very local delivery is best.

The local commander in the sub-division, or whatever the local force calls it, should have much more autonomy over everything from setting his budget to how he deploys his officers. He or she should remain in post for longer than usual at present, get to know the local community and take personal responsibility for delivering policing in that neighbourhood. Apart from that, however big the overall force is, people will ask many questions about the size of the county or multi-county headquarters, all the people who work in it, and whether we need 43 of them scattered across the country.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Home Secretary's statement about resourcing astonishes me. Will he give me some assurance about the future of the north Wales police? They have been undermanned by 70 constables for five, six and seven years, despite repeated requests from several hon. Members from north Wales. Under the new proposal, will we have yet more gross underfunding and another Government cop-out?

Mr. Clarke: I have already said that funding in the police service has increased in real terms by 81 per cent. since the Government have been in power. Spending on the police service for the coming year has increased by much more than on other local authority responsibilities. We should not continue a political debate in which all that anyone can think to say about the police service locally is that it is underfunded or undermanned.

I am getting rid of the Home Secretary control, whereby I and my office have to determine how many police officers north Wales is allowed to have. We have an absurd exchange each year, in which the police authority asks for a lot more police officers. It knows perfectly well that it will not get them. I always turn it down. The political debate is reduced to nonsense about how undermanned the police force is. In future, we shall give the money to whatever police force delivers the service in north Wales, and leave it to the stronger police authority and the chief constable to decide whether to spend it on men, equipment, cars, buildings or whatever.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I very much welcome the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend is looking for those administrative arrangements that will best help the day-to-day pursuit and prosecution—I emphasise prosecution—of crime. I also welcome what he said about local police being accountable to local communities. But is he aware that in Avon and Somerset we will be looking at his proposals with considerable interest, because that is an unhappy relationship? Only this last week, the Avon councillors have vetoed a sensible proposal by Somerset for increasing police resources.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that we should concentrate on how best the police prosecute their business, in every sense of that word, locally. Already, a much more active debate about the effectiveness of policing in parts of the country is taking place than for a long time. Many more comparisons are made of detection rates, arrest rates and so on than anyone ever thought of making until the recent past.

I shall not intrude into the disputes between Avon and Somerset. I know that it is sometimes an uncomfortable relationship. Somerset believes that it is subsidising Avon, and Avon believes that too much is drawn out to Somerset. I hope that the proposal that only half the members of a police authority should be elected local politicians and that the others should be appointed for other qualities will help to improve the internal tensions inside that structure.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Home Secretary enter into serious discussions with lawyers about the procedures which lead to police squandering time hanging around court? I am told that up to 20 per cent. of police time is spent hanging around court, often needlessly, and police are uncalled when they could be doing other things. How does that fit in with any serious performance relation?

Mr. Clarke: The short answer is yes. Obviously that is not directly within the subject today, but is very relevant to it. It affects police performance. I have frequently had conversations with my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor and with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General on matters of this kind. I strongly agree with the hon. Gentleman that, at the moment, the amount of time spent abortively at court by police, prison officers, solicitors, witnesses and victims is excessive, and we must find some way of cutting it down.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. We are now going to move on.

Points of Order

4.35 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether I could draw your attention to Question 120 on the Order Paper for today. This is a question by the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) to the Secretary of State for the Environment in connection with the proposed east Thames corridor development. I have been to the Library as recently as five minutes ago, and there was no copy of that reply there, although I understand that members of the press either have the full substantive reply or, certainly, have received a press notice which I have in front of me now, saying that the Secretary of State for the Environment will be announcing "the Government's approach" to the proposals for the east Thames corridor at a press conference at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning at the Department of the Environment.

The point I wish to raise with you, Madam Speaker, is that it seems on the face of it, to say the least, that people outside Parliament are going to be briefed about the Government's proposals for the east Thames corridor before this place is briefed, and that, unusually, a parliamentary reply is not available for hon. Members to see in the Library. Other parliamentary replies which are on today's Order Paper are in the Library.

The press have been told about a press conference tomorrow, and I think that they have probably got a substantive reply. This House is being abused and bypassed by the Secretary of State for the Environment on a major issue affecting hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people along the east Thames corridor in which my constituency is included.

Can I have your help, Madam Speaker? Is this a matter of privilege? Can you get us——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have got the point, thank you very much. Let me assure the House that, if the text of the answer to a parliamentary question has already been supplied to the press, it should also be available to Members of this House. I hope that those who are on the Front Bench at the moment will take note of that and see that it is made immediately available. [Interruption.] Order. I have not finished yet. Hon. Members should not get so excited. As hon. Members know, I would deprecate a Minister making an announcement to the media before making it to the House, but I have also to say to the hon. Gentleman that whether a Minister comes to the Dispatch Box or answers a written Question, is entirely a matter for the Minister, and has nothing whatever to do with the Chair.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I doubt if there can be anything further to that point. I have answered it very thoroughly.

Mr. Banks rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have dealt with it very thoroughly. I have dealt with the written Question which should be available to Members immediately. I have dealt with the matter of deprecating statements made outside, and I have made the point that whether a Minister comes to the Dispatch Box or answers a written Question is entirely a matter for that Minister. There can be no further point of order.

Mr. Banks: There was.

Madam Speaker: There was, but now there is not—is that right?

Mr. Banks: You have covered virtually all the points, Madam Speaker, but the Order Paper shows that Question 120 is not the only one that falls into that category. One can only say that there appears there, at the end of Questions, what one can only charitably call the brown nose gang, who are fairly regularly there and are always prepared to put down questions at the behest of Ministers, the night before answer. Is that not something that ought to be referred to the Procedure Committee?

Madam Speaker: If the hon. Member wants to do that, he is entitled to, but I have made the position clear to the House, and I hate to go on repeating myself. Hon. Members often repeat themselves, but it is not for the Speaker of this House to go on repeating herself. But just so that it is made very clear, I should say that it is up to the Minister whether an answer is by a written statement or he comes to the Dispatch Box. That has nothing whatever to do with the Chair. That is the end of it: there can be no further point of order on that matter.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you take a further point?

Madam Speaker: No, I am afraid I cannot. We are now going to move on. There cannot be another point of order. We are going to move on.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must resume his seat. I have dealt very thoroughly with that matter.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

Land Registry

That the draft Land Registry Trading Fund Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

Question agreed to.

Children's Playing Space

4.40 pm

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to secure the provision of adequate playing space in new residential developments; and for connected purposes.

I have an interest to declare, not just as a parent but as chairman of the National Playing Fields Association, which is the national trust of recreational space, a charity founded in the 1920s by a group of farsighted men and women who recognised the simple truth that every child deserves a place to play.

This is an issue that unites hon. Members on all sides of the House and always has. Three quarters of a century ago, the former Prime Minister and Member for Caernarvon Boroughs, David Lloyd George, declared:

"The right to play is a child's first claim on the community. Play is nature's training for life. No community can infringe that right without doing deep and enduring harm to the bodies and minds of its citizens."

Informal play is not something trivial; it is not an optional extra. Play is fundamental. Play is essential for a child to develop physically, mentally, emotionally and socially. It is a means of learning to live, not just a way of passing time. That is why every child needs a place to play safely, to allow the body and the mind to develop to the full.

As a society, we cannot have it both ways: we cannot on the one hand deplore young people at worst turning to drugs or under-age drinking, hooliganism or vandalism, or at best sitting listlessly for hours in front of a flickering television screen and on the other deny those same young people the opportunities, the leadership, the space, to grow and develop in the way that we want them to.

Every child deserves a place to play. That is why my Bill will require planners, local authorities and developers to give proper priority in all new housing areas to the provision of adequate playing space. No one nowadays can build houses without making realistic provision for car parking, yet one can build a whole estate without having to provide anywhere for children to play. Do we really care more about our cars than about our kids?

Children need somewhere safe to play and somewhere near to home to play. All the research shows that children, particularly younger children, will not visit the local playground if it is too far from their own back door, and responsible parents are rightly concerned about letting their children stray too far from home. That is why my Bill calls for a tiered system of play provision to provide appropriate facilities for different play needs.

Small, secure sites of no more than 100 sq m—I have called them local areas for play, or LAPs; people who enjoy acronyms will take that on board—would have to be provided on every new estate in sufficient numbers to ensure that the nearest LAP was not more than 100 m from any home. Larger sites, including play equipment—I call these local equipped areas for play, or LEAPs—would be required within 400 m of any home.

To those who ask, "It's a nice idea, but is it realistic?" I can reply that already one developer, Wimpey Homes, and a handful of local authorities have taken the concept on board and are adopting the proposals, without loss of housing space and at comparatively little cost.

The cost is indeed trivial when set in its proper context. Each year, we spend millions and millions of pounds on building superb new roads, but next to nothing on providing places for children to play. To say that this is a life-and-death issue is not to exaggerate. Every year, some 20,000 children are injured and some 300 children are killed on our roads, many of them because they are playing in streets that are not safe for them. This is a life-and-death issue; it is also a quality of life issue.

I fear that we are today robbing children of childhood. We live in a world where children spend three full working days every week watching television; where an increasing number of families do not sit down to eat together; where the proliferation of television sets in every household sometimes means that they do not even view together; where the crude, the ugly and the violent are paraded as commonplace; where popular papers print pages of material that a generation ago would have featured only in adult magazines. In my constituency this weekend, I visited an estate where there are six 14-year-old girls who are already mothers.

We must restore innocence to the young. We must give children back their childhood. We must recognise that every child, however tough the exterior, however sophisticated the veneer, deserves and needs a place to play in freedom and in safety. That is the issue that my Bill seeks to address.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gyles Brandreth, Mrs. Angela Knight, Mr. Peter Bottomley, Mr. Alan Howarth, Mr. Ian McCartney, Mrs. Angela Browning, Ms Liz Lynne, Mr. Keith Hill, Mr. Raymond Robertson and Ms Glenda Jackson.

CHILDREN'S PLAYING SPACE

Mr. Gyles Brandreth accordingly presented a Bill to secure the provison of adequate playing space in new residential developments; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time, and printed. [Bill No.168.]

Orders of the Day

Agriculture Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

4.46 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Our farmers and our food industry want to be able to compete effectively in the European Community and elsewhere in the world. The Bill will help them to do so by removing present disadvantages and bringing the industry up to date.

When the milk marketing scheme was introduced 60 years ago, its very characteristics as a monopoly were hailed as the salvation of producers. Times have changed, however, and the scheme is now the farmer's gaoler not his saviour.

What was essentially a commodity market for whole milk, butter and Cheddar cheese is now a sophisticated consumer market. Who would have thought 60 years ago that nearly half the liquid milk sold would be skimmed or semi-skimmed? In just over a decade, consumption of these types of milk has gone from 1 per cent. of the England and Wales liquid market to 44 per cent. Who would have thought, too, that butter consumption would have fallen away dramatically, while consumption of cream, yoghurt and fromage frais was rising steeply? Indeed, who in this country would even have heard of fromage frais in 1933?

There have been other changes, too. Our home market now reaches over much of western Europe, which means that, if United Kingdom-based processors are to compete, they must supply what the consumer wants, or others will do so instead. Farmers know better than anyone that we cannot produce as much milk as we should like, or even as much as we can use. Therefore, restricted by quota, we simply have to put our milk to the most productive use. We cannot go on exporting bulk commodity products and getting low prices for them, and importing huge quantities of high-value processed products, giving those who export from other countries the benefit of our market, while we do not get the proper benefit of theirs. It is ridiculous that these low-value exports should have had a priority call on the nation's milk supply, but that is part and parcel of the present system.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The Minister is absolutely right. The creamery in my constituency could produce four times as much cheese as it does if it had the milk. Does he accept that, whereas in the 1930s undoubtedly the state monopoly of the Milk Marketing Board worked wonders and saved the industry, there would be real dangers if we now replaced it with a private monopoly without safeguards? Can he give an assurance that, with regard to such things as national milk records and milk testing, there will not be a monopoly in the hands of Milk Marque; there will be an even-handed approach to all companies and an even pricing regime; the assets of the milk marketing boards will not be automatically transferred; and particularly that the confidential information that they have will not remain within Milk Marque, giving it an advantage in the marketplace over other companies?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right in his assessment of the change and of the need to make sure that, after the change, there are not unsuitable monopolistic preferences for one organisation rather than another. When the milk marketing boards produce and present their proposals, I shall look at them very carefully, and it will certainly not be my intention to give an unfair advantage to any organisation, although I shall want to ensure that there is proper continuity between the present and the future. I cannot rule on propositions that I have not yet received, but the hon. Gentleman knows me well enough to realise that I would have no intention of putting individual producers in a position in which they were unable to make a fair and reasonable decision for themselves.

As the hon. Member for Caernafon (Mr. Wigley) has said, the real question is not whether the scheme should go, but how it has lasted so long. It was excellent to begin with, but it is increasingly out of touch with reality. That is not simply the Government's assessment; the boards have long recognised that the scheme was falling apart at the seams in the face of changing markets, legal challenges and commercial pressures. Nevertheless, those 60 years of history meant that it was not easy for the boards to propose the ending of the scheme and that deserves recognition and praise.

We now have proposals for change from all five milk marketing boards. The Bill seeks to build on their initiative by enabling them to submit formal reorganisation schemes for Ministers' approval. That approach reflects the Government's desire not to sweep aside what producers have built up over the years, but to give their boards a major say in the future shape of the industry.

It has been my view all along that there is a balance to be struck between the veritable fact that these boards have had the support and encouragement of producers for many years—they have done many good things; it would not be right for us to ignore their experience or not to listen to what they have to say—and the fact that there are very real problems in the market at the moment, so we cannot, of necessity, agree in advance to accept everything that the boards suggest. There has to be a balance, and the hon. Member for Caernarfon was perfectly right in trying to reach towards such a balance; that is what we are seeking.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Many of us represent rural constituencies which are extremely difficult to pronounce, as the Minister knows only too well. My constituency is Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley.

The Minister says that he does not accept everything that is put forward, but the Scottish milk marketing board put forward a scheme for a vertically integrated co-operative supported by the NFU and the producers. I was given to understand that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who is sitting next to the Minister, also supported it. Yet because it was referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, the Government said that it could not go ahead, and the whole thing was rejected. That was taking no account of what the producers think. Why have the Government taken such a dictatorial attitude in Scotland?

Mr. Gummer: I do not want to start a note of dissent, and I want to stress what a mild-mannered person I am on these issues. It is all right for the hon. Gentleman to say what he did, but I thought that he supported the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and wanted there to be an arrangement whereby the consumer was protected. It was not the Government who rejected the scheme; the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's recommendation suggested that what the board proposed was not conducive to consumers' interests. That is not for me to gainsay. Since the statement was made, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for Scotland has in no way suggested that we should override the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Had he or I done so and told the House that we did not agree with the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on this issue, hon. Members on both sides of the House would have objected.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: I should move on, as I think I have been clear on the issue, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Foulkes: I shall not argue that there should be another Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry, but did not the Government refer the scheme to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission because they did not want it to go ahead? Were they not under pressure from Robert Wiseman in Scotland, which wants to undermine the scheme? No doubt that company has some influence in Scottish Conservative circles and is trying to undermine the scheme that the NFU suggested, which is supported by the vast majority if not all the milk producers.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is not right. The board went to the Office of Fair Trading which referred the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The hon. Gentleman should not see conspiracy where there is public accountability of a sort that has always had bipartisan support. I suggest that we accept that the proposals by the marketing boards ought to form the basis of the way in which we proceed, but that does not mean that every detail of the boards' present proposals will necessarily be approved.

There are important considerations to be taken into account as laid down in the Bill. There is the allocation of boards' assets, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon said, and the prospect for the development of competition, the interests of consumers and producers and whether the proposed trading practices of successor bodies take account of the interests of milk purchasers.

The boards' proposals must be considered on their merits when they are formally submitted to Ministers. For that reason, I am not able to tell the House whether I find any particular element of the England and Wales boards' proposals acceptable. The Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland will find themselves in the same position in relation to their boards' proposals and many elements of the present scheme mean that that is inevitable because of the quasi-judicial position that Ministers have in the administration of a scheme which will remain in force until it is replaced.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Has my right hon. Friend seen that it was pointed out in The Grocer of 20 March 1993 that Milk Marque had asked processors to say by 15 April this year how much milk they would want in the year 1994-95? Does he not realise that within Milk Marque there are those who have been monopolists and wish to remain monopolists, and who are rather indifferent to the interests of the industry and the consumer?

Mr. Gummer: I have seen the point that my hon. Friend raises. I hope that he has seen the press release by the milk marketing boards correcting the interpretation of what they have done and making it quite clear that they have no intention of acting in a way that would be contrary to the consumers' interests. I can assure my hon. Friend that I will make sure that they continue in those terms and that the boards have recognised that that must be made absolutely clear.

My hon. Friend has raised an important point and I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will read carefully what the milk marketing boards have said, so that there is no mistake about what was meant by what they said and how they mean to proceed. I assure hon. Gentlemen that I shall make sure that there is no such mistake.

I am, however, confident that we shall achieve an orderly change to the more competitive marketing structure within which producers and processors alike will be able to take advantage of normal commercial freedom.

For the first time in 60 years, producers will be free to sell to whomever they want, and processors will be free to buy direct from producers or other groups. I welcome the fact that a number of competing organisations seem likely to be set up. Both Northern Foods and Nestlé announced important initiatives in this respect. It is in everyone's interests for a truly competitive market to develop, not only in Britain, and to enable those competitive bodies to sell throughout the European Community.

I do not mind at all if people in Britain buy dairy products produced in the rest of the Community, as long as we are selling at least as much in the rest of the Community. This is not a "buy British" campaign; it is a desire to see that the French have the opportunity to buy fine British products, just as we have the opportunity to buy what the French produce. We must put ourselves in a position to be able to do so effectively.

The ending of the milk marketing schemes will amount to a major deregulation measure, replacing bureaucratic control with freedom of action, and will liberate much creative potential, which is suppressed at the moment, and help our processors and producers to challenge foreign competitors to provide what the consumer wants.

Two years ago, the present change in attitude would have been unthinkable. At that time, the majority of producers were full of apprehension about the idea of change. Now the debate is not about whether change should take place, but about the form that it should take. Many producers are actively considering the new opportunities that are about to open up for them and the Labour party has changed its view on the matter, in response to that changed attitude. There is a growing consensus on the subject.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): At several meetings with the Scottish Dairy Trade Federation and farmers' organisations, I have heard great concern expressed about what will happen to the boards' assets on their dissolution. Can the Minister give some information or a sign of what he intends to do with their assets?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that concern, but I cannot make a decision until I see the proposals of the English and Welsh boards and until my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland knows the views of the Scottish boards. We shall then seek to make a decision that properly reflects the interests of the various parties. We have already made a statement in England and Wales about the future of Dairy Crest's assets, which will be entirely separated from the milk marketing boards for England and Wales. A decision will have to wait until we know the boards' proposals, as they will propose different things. As that is the way in which the law is set out, it is right for us to follow that course. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall carefully consider the proposals and the concerns of producers, who make up the boards and have an interest in how their assets are dealt with.

Although there has been a great change in attitude on milk, the situation is different with potatoes. I appreciate that producers and others have had less time to think things through and to accept the idea of ending the potato marketing scheme.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall not give way yet, as I have some comments to make which I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to hear.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Before the Minister goes on to the subject of potatoes, could he tell us whether he has ruled out any arbitration procedure on price in the deregulated milk market?

Mr. Gummer: In advance of the boards' proposals, I would not like to say that I have ruled out anything of that sort, but I see no role at the moment for further statutory interference in the way in which the market will operate. I shall certainly not be dogmatic, as I am not a dogmatic person, but I would not want to suggest to anyone that I have that high on my list of priorities, and I do not think that I should be led down that route, although the hon. Gentleman may be able to change my mind.

On potatoes, I appreciate that there has been less time to think things through and to accept the idea of ending the potato marketing scheme, but I think that the House will agree that, in a single market, where there is no possibility of restricting imports, it would be ridiculous for our growers to be shackled by a quota system while everyone else in Europe could grow what they liked, where they liked and for as much as they liked.

I can suggest only one example to the House. Just suppose that my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I returned to the House from a meeting in Brussels saying that we had triumped and reached an agreement on vining peas, whereby every country in Europe could grow as many vining peas as it liked, except the United Kingdom, where production would be restricted. I do not think the House would regard that as a triumph. Hon. Members would say that the agreement discriminated against the United Kingdom. They would say that it would not be long before pea processors found that they had better move their processing factories from the United Kingdom, where production was restricted, to somewhere that it was not.

Frankly, I have not been fighting against discrimination for two and a half years—after those proposals of Mr. MacSharry—to reintroduce it and to cause this country self-inflicted damage, and that would not be an acceptable way to meet the needs of the potato industry.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall be happy to give way, but, before the hon. Gentleman gets too uptight, I just want the House to recognise that one could replace the word "potatoes" with any other agricultural or non-agricultural product. Producers in this country have to compete in a single market and one cannot prevent imports, so it would be difficult to suggest that it would be beneficial to them to reduce their ability to compete, and it does not make sense.

Mr. Salmond: Has not the Minister almost conceded that the vehemence of the attack by him and the Minister of State on the potato marketing scheme is not widely shared in Scotland? In fact, many of us believe that it is not even shared in the Scottish Office. Are we going to hear the viewpoint of the Scottish Office, or is the Scottish Office Minister going to sit there with his face a picture of misery while the Minister once again rides roughshod over Scottish interests?

Mr. Gummer: As this is the United Kingdom, I hope to apply myself to the loss of market share for the Scottish seed potato industry, which is a matter of great concern to the United Kingdom as a whole, as it is an important part of the potato industry and an important export earner.

I hope that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) will listen carefully, because I am not speaking merely on behalf of England and Wales but for the entire United Kingdom. Ministers representing the United Kingdom, including Scottish Office Ministers, are committed to a healthy potato industry throughout the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan is a member of that great European party, the Scottish National party. Is he proposing that the single market—on which the Scottish nationalists are so keen and which they are supporting throughout Scotland and to everyone else who would hear them—will work better if one country suggests that its producers should be uniquely shackled to a system that does not affect any other country? I have rarely heard such an argument for nationalism before. It is nationalism without any advantage to the nationalists.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman for one moment, as I want to read my next paragraph, which might help him.

I wish to examine carefully the proposals put forward by those who do not like my suggestion. In the single market, we need to enable our producers to compete on level terms with their continental counterparts.

Mr. Home Robertson: What about a level playing field?

Mr. Gummer: I shall come back to that in a moment, as there was a ten-minute Bill on the subject this afternoon.

During the past 10 years, imports of processed products, which are the growth area of the market, and of seed potatoes, which are particularly important to Scottish growers, have been growing. We need to reverse that trend, and I am sure that our growers can do so if they are freed from the shackles of the quota system.

Several claims have been made about the existing scheme which need to be countered, and I wish to list them before the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) intervenes and doubtless produces an extra claim.

The first claim is that the high consumption of potatoes in Great Britain is somehow linked to the existence of the Potato Marketing Board. The argument may seem obviously ridiculous, but I hear it regularly as I travel around the country to listen to people arguing the case. Our potato consumption is due to our historic dietary choice, and it is higher in the Republic of Ireland, which has no Potato Marketing Board. I do not think that, if we got rid of the board, or changed its functions, the people of Britain would cease to eat potatoes. That argument is bureaucratic and I think that most Conservative Members would find it unacceptable.

The second claim is that our high degree of self-sufficiency in fresh potatoes is somehow due to the board; that is just not true. That self-sufficiency is due to the fact that our producers have the advantage that it costs up to £35 per tonne to bring potatoes across the channel and, therefore, our competitors clearly start at a disadvantage with what might be inelegantly called dirty potatoes. The problem arises with the processed product, because as the value of a product rises compared to transport costs, the home producers' advantage falls. Therefore, it is not surprising that we have a high proportion of the fresh potato market, but import many processed potatoes. Surely that shows that, wherever the added value is sufficient to counteract the transport costs, our producers do less well. The effect is caused by transport costs, not the operation of the board.

The third and most persistent worry of those who wish to retain the status quo is that removal of the quota system will lead to instability in the market. The evidence does not suggest that our quota system leads to greater stability here. [Interruption.] I see that the hon. Member for East Lothian does not agree. However, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I started off by believing that the system created stability. I had always believed that to be the case, because I had never checked the figures. I thought that I should do so.

If we compare the year-on-year prices changes in the United Kingdom with those in the other main producer states—France, Germany and the Netherlands—we see an interesting pattern. Between 1979-91, our prices were more volatile than all the others in no fewer than three years. They were more volatile than at least one of the other countries in five years, and the least volatile in only four years. That is hardly a convincing case for the retention of a board——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about prices and contracts?

Mr. Gummer: I know that the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of potatoes is immense, but I shall come to the issue of contracts and prices in a moment. I am now dealing with the volatility of prices, which is a matter of considerable interest. The board always raises that issue when it argues that consumers are protected because we have a system under which our prices are much less volatile. They are not. The board apparatus has not done anything to make prices in this country less volatile than those of our major competitors.

The fourth argument is that, without the board, prices would fall dramatically. The price of potatoes for processing will have to be governed by competition, whatever we do. No board will make it possible for Britain to have higher prices for potatoes than the Dutch, Danes, Belgians, Germans or French. A single market is all about competition; if other people can produce something cheaper than we do, we cannot protect ourselves in a single market by running a bureaucratic scheme. Some people might like to do so, but we do not have to propose that suggestion—the Scottish nationalists certainly cannot do so, as they are in favour of the single market and are as enthusiastic about it as I am. I am pleased about that—it is the only thing that I can find in favour of the Scottish National party.

We must accept that the price of potatoes for processing will be fixed by the competition, not by any board. That means that the price of dirty potatoes will continue to be protected by the channel, but not the price of processed potatoes. Perhaps we should consider carefully the proposals that I understand the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has been working on. I put it like that because his proposals in Committee, when we discussed the potato scheme, were in skeleton form. The hon. Gentleman's proposals have also been discussed around the country as he has travelled around to try to discover whether he can make them work. I have tried hard to put together such a scheme, which is designed to distinguish between dirty potatoes and processed potatoes, with the board controlling one category but not the other.

I am looking forward to seeing how the hon. Gentleman has changed the scheme since it was first revealed. The difficulty of dividing processed and non-processed potatoes is that there is generally no difference between them. Some potatoes that are grown for processing turn out to be unsuitable for processing, so people sell them in different forms. I do not know how we would deal with potatoes for export under such a scheme. Are we to colour the potatoes, with green ones for those controlled by the board and blue ones for those that are not? Doubtless a bureaucratic mechanism can be contrived whereby we can continue to have a board that does not do anything about a situation that needs nothing done to it as the function is already served by the channel.

I realise that the Labour party is keen for the Government to get in on the act, and that it is not easy to leave the channel to its own devices. Therefore, if the hon. Member for Workington brings forward his proposals, we will listen carefully to see whether they can be used. However, I suspect that the Labour party—although it would like to gain support among those who are still unconvinced of the need to change the board—knows in its heart of hearts that the board's quota arrangements no longer fulfil a useful purpose. Therefore, we need to move towards a freer system.

Mr. Home Robertson: Surely the people involved in the potato market—be they producers or consumers—are better judges of what is best for that market than the Minister is, as a politician. The Minister has repeatedly said that the scheme is "shackling" potato producers in Britain. Is he suggesting that the producers, who want to maintain the scheme, are masochists?

Mr. Gummer: I should have thought that the best judges were the people buying the product. They have made it clear that future investment will be where the potatoes are available and the product should be as available in this country as it is in Holland. We do not even need to ask the processors about that, as we automatically know the answer.

Even if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, think hard and long, can you produce a single product that you could say would be protected in a single market by the fact that one part of that market had to restrict the production of the product and, at the same time, expect the consumer to buy the product where it is least available? The idea goes against every rule of economics.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): My right hon. Friend keeps arguing as though no one in continental Europe wants to restrict their product and the other 11 countries are unanimous in wanting a free market. He knows that that is not the case, and many of the European countries want a heavier potato regime than we have.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right about Portugal, which has a heavier regime than we do. But we do not generally compete with Portugal for potato sales. No country in the Community has ever suggested that we should spread the British system throughout the whole of the Community. Most countries in the Community are clear that they want the lightest possible potato regime and the greatest competition.

I know my hon. Friend's views on other matters, and it seems odd that he should suggest that we should continue with such a proposition in a single market. He would be right to say that it would be worth while to argue about whether we should have a controlled or a non-controlled system if all the other 11 countries—or a significant proportion of them—wanted a system such as we have here. As someone who believes in a freer market, I think that, even in those circumstances, it would be better to have a less-controlled system. I cannot find anyone in the Community who is at all interested in having a system in which everyone is controlled.

There are those who would like Britain to continue with her system as long as they do not have to have it as well — that is one of the problems. Some people have suggested to me that we should agree to have our system. They say that, although the Commission may not like it, the rest of the countries will sign up to such a system—of course, they will. If I were a competitor, I would immediately sign up to an agreement that restricted my major competitor to a quota system.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I think that the Minister might at least acknowledge that the Conservative party is deeply divided on the issue. Is he aware that an amendment to the draft European Community potato regime was carried in the Agriculture Committee this afternoon? That amendment was moved by the Conservative Member of the European Parliament for Lancashire, Central. The amendment explicitly provides for the maintenance of the national organisations. It stated:

"At its request, a Member State may be authorized to grant an organization established or maintained for the purpose of stabilizing the market in potatoes in the whole part of the territory of that Member State."

It goes on to refer to the right to estabish production quotas for, and to levy contributions from, potato producers. It provides for a future for the Potato Marketing Board—and it was successfully moved by a Conservative Member of the European Parliament.

Mr. Gummer: Well, he is wrong—utterly wrong. The proposal would do grave damage to the British potato industry.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How about that?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman always finds every member of his party worthy of support. I have often sat here when he has been squirming while the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) outlined his alternative economic policies. Although the Conservative Member of the European Parliament in this case is a man of excellent ability and remarkable standing on all other issues, on this one I beg to differ with him.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that over the past decade there has been an increase of 300,000 tonnes in the imports of processed potatoes to this country, at a cost to the balance of payments of £125 million—a considerable cost to employment in the food processing industry?

Mr. Gummer: I can certainly confirm that. That is why, if we left the potato system as it is, we would find ourselves with a steadily decreasing part of the section of the industry which is growing, but holding on to our dominance in a section of production which is bound to decrease.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Has not my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) hit the nail on the head? If a major part of the 550,000 tonnes of exported produce were repatriated to this country, it would enable our growers to grow 30,000 more acres of potatoes.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right, but we can do that only if the processors understand that there will be a continuous supply and that they will not be hindered in ways that they would not encounter elsewhere. McDonald's uses 80,000 tonnes of potatoes in this country already. It would be extremely good if, as it expanded throughout Europe—it expects to open nearly 1,000 restaurants in Europe in the coming year—at least some of that expansion came from British-produced potato chips.

Mr. Home Robertson: And why not?

Mr. Gummer: If the company has the chance to process and produce in countries where there are no restrictions on acreage instead of in a country in which there are such restrictions, it will go to the countries where there are no restrictions. If the hon. Gentleman cannot see the obvious economic sense of that statement, I can understand why he is a socialist. Any fool can see that that will apply if production is restricted in a single market. The hon. Gentleman is a socialist and a farmer. He is also a landowner, I understand—although that is perhaps more difficult to understand. Perhaps I have discovered the answer, however: he is economically wrong. He may be socially and culturally right, but he is economically left.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am flattered to be described as a socialist, but cannot the Minister grasp the fact that, if there is a wonderful increase in potato sales, I have no doubt that the marketing board would cheerfully increase the quota and the basic acreage. That would overcome the problem.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has a wonderful new economic theory, which is that the only way supply can expand to meet demand is to put in place a board that would decide when demand is going to increase so that it can tell the producers when they can increase the supply. That theory has been tried in the Soviet Union and elsewhere for a long time, and it does not work. It is the market that operates in these cases, not bureaucratic groups of people who think they know best.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East) rose——

Mr. Home Robertson: She is a socialist, too.

Ms Corston: Indeed. Is the Minister aware of the possible consequences of the sort of uncontrolled market which he says he favours? I cite the case of New Brunswick, where the potato industry has been virtually destroyed by companies such as McCain, which dictate the sort of potatoes that must be grown, and that means in practice the mighty chip and the crisp? Meanwhile, the Secretary of State for Health encourages people, in "The Health of the Nation", to eat potatoes of a quite different sort. Is the Minister saying that our potato market must be structured so that only the potato processors get what they want?

Mr. Gummer: I think that the House is beginning to discover what the alternative is. It is that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health shall lay down the kind of potato which it is good for people to eat, whether they like it or not. Then she shall lay down the way in which those potatoes shall be cooked and processed. No doubt socialist councils will send inspectors out into people's homes to discover whether they are cooking potatoes in the requisite vegetable oil and to see that they are not using animal fats. They might also check on the number of chips fried per person per week, to see whether it is below the national maximum stipulated. No doubt there will be special derogations for those who work in heavy industry and who therefore can deal with more animal fat than can those of us in sedentary occupations.

The hon. Lady is on to the same thing that Opposition Members always want—telling other people what is good for them. [Interruption.] I know that the hon. Member for Workington is worried about the people behind him—I would be, too. He has never been outflanked on the left before. The people of Workington had better get ready for reselection. They must look for someone who is more red-blooded—perhaps a woman who will be unreconstructed in her desire to tell the people of Britain how to eat their potatoes.

Sir Peter Tapsell: My right hon. Friend is being characteristically extremely amusing, witty and clever, but when all the clever economics have been voiced, the fact remains that there are many thousands of potato producers in this country, most of whom have always voted Conservative. As the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, he needs to take their views seriously. No amount of witticism will impress them. All the producers in my constituency believe that their livelihoods will be put at risk if there is unlimited capacity throughout the EC to grow potatoes. Potato producers on the continent of Europe think the same. It is only the Ministers whom my right hon. Friend meets at Councils in Brussels who do not hold that view.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is perfectly right to raise that serious issue. I am trying to distinguish between the obvious nonsense that the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) introduced to the discussion and the serious issue that he raises. Many people who produce potatoes —there are many in my constituency, just as there are in my hon. Friend's—are concerned that if the board disappears there will be an uncontrolled market in which they will find it difficult to compete. I understand that.

I must tell my hon. Friend as forcefully as I can that he is not right to say that the other countries of Europe want a controlled system like ours. Some farmers might like that, but in the end it is Ministers who decide what is best for the industry—[HON. MEMBERS: "Big brother."] Not at all. All the French potato producers in the world may think one thing, but if they cannot convince their Minister, in the end he will vote as he thinks right——

Sir Peter Tapsell: They have just voted him out.

Mr. Gummer: So they voted out the one person whom they might have persuaded to agree with this proposal. They have got rid of a socialist—on second thoughts, a fellow traveller—who has been thrown out all the more forcibly for that. He got a bit closer to the hon. Member for Bristol, East in his proposals. However, the French have now voted in a Government who will find it difficult to believe that the future of France lies in adopting the British potato regime. That is one thing that I do not think the new French Government will wish to do.

If there were an alternative that was supportable by the rest of Europe, my hon. Friend's argument would at least be worth continuing. I doubt, however, that I would be on the same side as him because I am not sure that the House would want ever further complications in the CAP. My hon. Friend is often one of those who point to the absurdities of having an over-regulated CAP system in other sectors. Therefore, I ask him to apply to the potato industry many of the strictures that, from time to time, he has perfectly reasonably raised about the rest of the CAP. It would not be sensible for the Government and the country to extend into another sector the very part of the CAP that, in every debate, both sides of the House object to because it is over-complicated, over-bureaucratised and over-expensive, and ends up with the taxpayer and the consumer paying even more.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gummer: I ought to continue, or there will not be time for others to speak. I had a short speech to make, but it has been interrupted on many occasions.

It is an irony that we have among our processors some of the best and most efficient companies in the world. What a terrible thing it would be if their investment were increasingly to go outside the United Kingdom. We must beware of falling into the situation of the dairy industry, where the high added-value products come increasingly from abroad, and we are left with the commodity end of the business. I am not prepared to be seen as the Minister who was so unable to confront short-term fears that he allowed an industry to destroy itself.

The House will wish to know that there will be a number of additional arrangements to be made to make the transition as smooth as possible. First, we shall not be seeking to reverse the amendments made in another place. There will merely be some tidying up of the wording. Secondly, part IV accomplishes what the Government announced in 1988—the ending of the potato guarantee. Unlike the enabling provisions of part II, ending the guarantee is a decision that has already been taken, and it will be carried out as soon as possible after Royal Assent. It is a decision already accepted by the industry and not, as far as I am aware, contentious. The third detailed point is that, as I have already pointed out, the Bill will enable the non-regulatory functions of the Potato Marketing Board to be carried out by a successor body.

I hope that the House recognises that we have to make some such change in any case, because if the European Community were to agree to a lightweight regime—the signs are, as I have tried to explain to my hon. Friends, that that will be the case—it would mean that the system would fall. It would not be able to continue. I do not want that to be the result. I want to have a system that will allow a satisfactory transition from one regime to the other. I hope that the industry will then face up to the question whether it wants a continuation of the board, which would deal, as it can, with the marketing and promotion of potatoes in generic terms and research. That would be done if a development council were the successor body to the board. If Ministers saw substantial support for that idea in the industry, they would be able to make the necessary order to allow the Potato Marketing Board to continue as a development council.

That would also enable the board to have levy-raising powers but, as there are some doubts about those powers, clause 52 improves the position by making it possible for a levy to be collected via an intermediary. That would also be helpful should the milk marketing arrangements be followed by a desire for the industry to have a development council. I am concerned that there should be no philosophical bar to the ability of the industry to decide that it wanted corporately to do some of those things for itself.

Part 3 deals with marketing grants.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gummer: I will give way, but it must be for the last time.

Mr. Gill: Could my right hon. Friend obtain clarification of the reference on line 4 of page 13 to given that on page 27 there is no clause 53(4)? I do not expect him to know the answer, but it would be helpful if he could obtain it.

"section 53(4) of this Act",

Mr. Gummer: I am always pleased to give way to my hon. Friend and never more so than I am now. I shall seek an answer, and I regret it if there has been a mistake.

In the detailed consideration that the Government have given to the marketing of both milk and potatoes, we have shown our concern to improve our ability to compete and to give our producers and manufacturers a better opportunity to win a larger share of the market for added-value products. In the same spirit, we introduced our marketing grants in April last year, following the seminar called by the Prime Minister in November 1991, which concluded that there was a need for farmers to develop professionally run marketing enterprises on a competitive scale.

For example, the opportunities presented by our supermarkets can be fully seized only by businesses big enough to negotiate satisfactory terms and to deliver the required quantity and quality consistently. There are some signs that, in other countries in the Community, the organisation of agricultural businesses and food processing is such that they can compete more effectively to sell into this country than we can into theirs. That is one reason why the marketing grant is so important.

Unfortunately, the existing grant scheme has its limitations, particularly in our ability to involve the businesses downstream of the producers, which are crucial to the success of the industry. Part III will enable us to introduce something more satisfactory. I have no doubt that groups of milk and potato producers will be among those applying for grant.

In part IV, there are a number of other items that the House will want me to refer to. The first is the wool guarantee. The Government announced, more than four years ago, their decision to end the wool guarantee. Clause 48 implements that decision. The guarantee was introduced in the 1950s with the reasonable aim of stabilising sheep farmers' returns from wool. Conditions are now different. Developments on the international wool market, where huge price changes can result from decisions taken in China, Russia, Australia and New Zealand, mean that the guarantee can no longer operate effectively when it is used entirely as a stabilisation measure. The sheep farmer now relies essentially on the return that he gets from the market, enhanced by the direct payments on breeding animals in the shape of annual ewe premiums and hill livestock compensatory allowances—payments which, for 1992, will total around £495 million.

In the light of the substantial support to the sector, continued Government intervention is unnecessary and simply cannot be justified. The marketing arrangements for clip wool, including the statutory monopoly on purchase, will be retained. The scheme has been administered effectively by the British wool marketing board, which will have an opportunity to build further on its achievements after the guarantee has ended.

I hope that the House will recognise that we have tried to look at each of these and get the best answers for Britain—not to apply to it some predetermined philosophical position. That is why we have insisted on keeping the scheme, because it is the one way in which we can deal, in an international market, with similar schemes that represent other people in other countries.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Unbelievable.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must accept that what one believes is the believable, and that is entirely believable. We shall listen to his speech at the end of the evening and see how one can go beyond the bounds of belief rapidly and never return.

A further belated recognition of changed realities is the abolition of the annual review of agriculture. It is a relic of the days when farm prices were fixed in consultation between the Government and the farmers' unions. Since we have joined the Community, the focus has switched to the CAP, and in that context our close contacts with the farmers' unions and other bodies will continue. The Government will also continue to publish an annual report on agriculture, as the Bill provides. I am sure that the House will agree that that is a sensible measure to bring the legislation up to date.

Of the Bill's remaining provisions, those relating to Northern Ireland will be found in clause 57, which lists those parts of the Bill that will apply directly to the Province. They include the termination of the wool guarantee. Clause 55 deals with the procedure for extending various other provisions to the north of Ireland. In that respect, I can confirm that it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to introduce an Order in Council to apply the provisions of part I so as to end the Northern Ireland milk marketing scheme.

It is the Government's purpose to do all that they can to enhance the conditions in which our food and farming industries can compete. We have identified a clear need to encourage groups of farmers and others to work together to improve the marketing of food and agricultural produce. As with the milk marketing boards, we have come to the clear conclusion that the statutory monopoly should give way to a better method of marketing milk and milk products.

Increasingly, the same conclusion comes to anyone who looks at the place of the Potato Marketing Board within the new European single market. It is not surprising, therefore, that there is mounting support for the proposals that the Government have put forward this evening.

Our aim is to help the industry do its job better, to liberate it from the shackles of the past and to realise its potential. At a time when there is so much talk of restrictions and quotas, this is a move to set the industry free. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.40 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): There can be no doubt about the importance of the Bill to agriculture, but it is also important to the food industry and to consumers, of whom there are millions in Britain.

The Bill will make fundamental changes to the way in which milk is marketed in Britain. For most people, milk and milk products, such as butter, cheese and yoghurt, are an important part of their diet. Annual household expenditure on milk and milk products is about £6 billion. About one seventh of what the average family spends on food goes on milk or milk products.

Consumers are entitled to ask whether the Bill will improve the quality of those foods. They are entitled to ask whether it will enable milk and its processed products to be marketed at lower prices. The answer to both those questions is an unequivocal no. The milk marketed in Britain is of the highest quality in Europe, and nothing in the Bill aims to improve that. The milk marketing boards deserve a great deal of the credit for the hygienic quality of our milk. It is to be hoped that the new arrangements will allow those standards to be maintained in the future.

The abolition of the milk marketing boards and the pricing arrangements which operated with them will not reduce the price of milk—far from it. There is a real danger that, as a result of the new arrangements, there will be an unjustified increase in the price of milk for consumers.

The House does not often have the opportunity to debate agriculture and the food industries. Total annual consumption of food and drink in Britain is now in excess of £90 billion, £45 billion of which is accounted for by household food expenditure and the remainder by drink and meals out. About one eighth of household expenditure is accounted for by expenditure on food. For people on low incomes, the proportion of their income that goes on food is much higher. Food is not just another product; it is a basic essential, like shelter, water and fuel.

Agriculture is important because it is a provider of the raw materials for our food industries. Hundreds of thousands of jobs in those industries are dependent on agriculture, and millions of pounds of investment each year. Agriculture is also important as the core of the rural economy in most parts of Britain. It is not just the jobs of the farmers and farm workers that are important but all the other jobs which are created by the inputs into agriculture and the expenditure created in those rural communities. That is why it is vital that the Government should provide adequate support for our agriculture industry.

It has to be said, and it gives me no pleasure to do so, that times have been hard for the agriculture industry in recent years. We have seen a fall in investment. The Government's own publication, "Agriculture in the United Kingdom 1992", published only last week, states:

> "The total stock of capital"— referring to investment in the industry—

> "has gradually declined over a number of years and is slightly below its 1981-83 level."

That is the measure of the extent to which the agriculture industry has been depressed for the past five or six years. It is a measure of the extent to which there has been under-investment in the industry.

There are some signs that things will improve in the future, primarily because of the devaluation of the pound, for which the Government can hardly claim credit, since they tried up to the last minute to avert it. Let us hope that that devaluation—black Wednesday, sometimes called golden Wednesday in the agricultural industry—and the subsequent alterations to the green rates, will lead not only to higher incomes for farmers and farm workers but to increased investment and an improvement in the overall jobs and standards of our agriculture industry.

Part II, dealing with milk marketing, is the most important part of the Bill. It is undoubtedly the case that the milk industry is vital to Britain. I have referred to its importance to consumers. The annual value of milk at the farm gate is about £2·8 billion. We have the best quality milk in the EC. Only Denmark has milk of comparable quality.

The milk marketing boards have provided a guaranteed outlet for British dairy farmers, no matter how remote their farms. They have also played a major part in maintaining a substantial doorstep delivery service in Britain. It is true that the amount of milk sold through the shops and supermarkets has increased, but the doorstep delivery service is at a level much higher than in any other European country. That is of benefit to Britain and something that we should seek to encourage and maintain. The milk marketing boards deserve credit for that.

There has been a suggestion recently in some quarters that the milk marketing boards have not achieved the most for the producers, that the price obtained by the producers in Britain through the boards has been less than in some other EC countries. I reject that as a criticism of the boards. I have never accepted that the purpose of the milk marketing boards was to maximise revenue. The milk marketing boards existed to strike a balance between the interests of the producers, the processing companies and the consumers. The pricing arrangements were designed to do that. They are based on a negotiation between the Dairy Trade Federation and the milk marketing boards.

The milk marketing boards have an excellent record in Britain on milk testing, on-farm milk recording, artificial insemination and all the other schemes developed and maintained by the boards which have brought substantial benefits to the British milk industry.

The milk marketing boards were established by legislation enacted in 1931 and 1933. Since then, there has been a bipartisan policy with all-party support for the milk marketing boards. There have been changes in social and economic conditions and the functions and role of the milk marketing boards have been adapted to meet them. In the 1970s, the milk marketing boards were threatened by the EC. The then Labour Government, of which I was a member, decided as a priority to secure amendments to the appropriate EC regulations to enable the milk marketing boards and their counterparts in Northern Ireland and Scotland to continue. In that, we were supported by the Conservative Opposition.

I am pleased to see in his place the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), a former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Speaking for the Opposition in a debate on agriculture in the House on 21 March 1978, he said:

"As to the future of the Milk Marketing Boards, the Conservative Party has consistently expressed its support for all our marketing boards, but we recognise that certain parts of the milk boards' activities might have to be altered. However, we believe that it is absolutely vital—we fully support the Government in their efforts—to preserve the basic functions of the milk boards and of the structure of milk marketing in this country. We think, above all, that it is right that the milk boards should preserve their powers to be the sole first buyers of milk and to have the right to pool prices.

To put in another way what the Minister said, it is no coincidence that the United Kingdom is almost the only country in Europe to have such a statutory organisation, while at the same time it is the only one to have such a large market for liquid milk sold on the doorstep . . . However, I cannot think of any other issue on which the whole House would be unanimous in opposition but that of failing to get a satisfactory solution to the position of our milk boards."—[Official Report, 21 March 1978; Vol. 946, c. 1358-59.]

We found that solution. I was privileged to be a junior Agriculture Minister in that Labour Government, and I remember sitting in the Council of Agriculture Ministers arguing for hours in an attempt to secure the changes in regulation which would enable our milk marketing boards to continue. We secured those changes, with the support of the whole House.

Since then, there have been some changes in the market place. In particular, we have witnessed the growth in low fat milks. Although the Minister did not refer to that directly in his speech, he alluded to one of the problems which developed during the 1980s—the failure of the scheme to provide properly for the production of low fat milks. The Government were told of that problem as long ago as 1986.

In 1984, the milk industry adopted a system of non-binding arbitration. The first arbiter was the late John Silkin, under whom I had the privilege of serving when he was Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In 1986, he produced the first non-binding report relating to milk marketing arrangements, stating:

"The question of low fat milk and other products now outside the Scheme and on-farm manufacture will in my view assume a much greater importance as time goes by to an extent where unless care is taken they may begin to threaten the existence of the Scheme itself. It is my opinion that it is to the interest of both the MMB and the DTF that a common course of action should be resolved between them. I would not regard the solution to this question as lying within the competence of this Opinion but I believe that an inquiry ought to be undertaken among all those concerned . . . It is my recommendation that MAFF should undertake an internal inquiry into the problem, which, as I stated . . . unless care is taken, might begin to threaten the existence of the Scheme itself".

Of course, Ministers did not respond to that. Although they received regular representations from the Dairy Trade Federation, no action was taken. It is hard to resist the conclusion that the Government were happy to preside over the undermining of the scheme, because they wanted it to be challenged: for dogmatic reasons, they wanted to bring about circumstances in which it would be easy for them to wind up the boards, as they are doing today.

As there is a substantial Conservative majority in the House, it is possible that the Bill will be given a Second Reading. As a constructive Opposition, we shall concentrate on the arrangements with which the Government—or, indeed, the milk marketing boards—wish to replace the existing system. Our first and fundamental criticism of the Government relates to their adication of responsibility for introducing satisfactory arrangements. Surely no food industry is more important to the country than the milk industry. It is highly efficient and a great national asset. In making such a historic change, the Government have an obligation to endure that it develops satisfactorily.

Mr. Gill: Who does the hon. Gentleman believe knows more about the milk industry—both production and processing—than the industry itself? Why should politicians decide such matters? I think that the hon. Gentleman is quite wrong.

Dr. Strang: We live in a democracy, and the way in which things happen is decided by Government and by Parliament. Of course, before introducing any replacement scheme, the Government should consult not only the milk marketing board and other boards but the Dairy Trade Federation, the consumer organisations and all interested parties. That is not in dispute. None the less, it is entirely inappropriate for the milk boards to introduce the new scheme. Although that scheme should be based very much on the views of the boards, open and public consultation should have taken place. Given the importance of the industry, the Government should have accepted their responsibility to present alternative arrangements, which should then have been dealt with by affirmative resolution in both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Gummer: Would the hon. Gentleman apply the same argument to, for example, the car industry? Does he suggest that the Government should present proposals about the way in which that industry should conduct itself, or is it better for those in the business of manufacturing cars to run that business as they think best? Is it not rather curious to suggest that the milk industry does not know its own business? I thought that the hon. Gentleman believed that ours was the best milk in the European Community. Surely the producers of the best milk in the Community can decide how best to produce it.

Dr. Strang: If there were a national car marketing board with the statutory right to buy every car manufactured in the country, and if the Government were about to wind up that monopoly, I would indeed suggest that they introduce satisfactory arrangements to free the market and eliminate the monopoly.

I am not sure whether the Minister attended this morning's meeting at which Ministers examined the future of the coal industry, but I believe that there may well be a parallel not with the car industry, but with the highly regulated energy industry. When the Government sought to deregulate that industry, they tried to pretend that it was a genuinely free market; in fact, it was a market dominated by major companies and major vested interests. We are likely to see a milk market dominated by the successor to the milk marketing board—Milk Marque—which may involve 80 or 90 per cent. of producers. The Government should face up to their responsibilities. They should have had the courage to consult the industry, and to present their own proposals to free the market, if that is what they wish to do.

The European Commission has already told the milk marketing boards and the Government what they can and cannot do. The Commission has said—understandably, and I do not think that any hon. Member would necessarily dispute its view—that it would not be acceptable for the milk marketing boards and Dairy Crest, their processing arm, to be allowed to continue as a single body in a voluntary market. Such a body would be huge, not only in terms of the milk market in England and Wales but in terms of the European Community market. The Commission decided that the milk marketing boards and Dairy Crest should be separated.

At that point, the Government could have made a decision. They could have considered whether there was a case for integrated milk co-operatives, allowing the processing arm to be associated with the producers. They could have decided to set up a number of integrated producer co-operatives. I am not saying that that is the best solution; I am merely saying that it is very unsatisfactory that the Government never even considered it.

The Northern Ireland milk marketing board buys more milk than its Scottish counterpart. Surely there is a case for protecting the Northern Ireland board, which is fundamentally important to Northern Ireland's agriculture, and for helping to ensure that its processing facilities —which need help and investment—can be maintained. As my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) pointed out, the position in Scotland is ridiculous.

I refer to a report: it is not about the Scottish milk market, or about whether the processing arm of the Scottish board should remain with the board—it concerns only whether the Scottish board could acquire a dairy from the Co-operative Wholesale Society in Glasgow. Anyone reading the report may be surprised by its conclusion. I must say that I was surprised. I thought that it made a very good case, on the ground that there is a real United Kingdom milk market—not only in processed products such as butter and cheese, but in the milk that flows across the border between Scotland and England. I was amazed that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission concluded that that merger should not take place. It is unacceptable that, as a result of that report, we are being told that the processing side of the Scottish milk marketing board must be split from the producer organisation.

The European Commission does not believe that the industry in Northern Ireland and Scotland is big enough to have a distorting effect on the market for milk in Europe. Having decided to get rid of the milk marketing boards and the statutory scheme—a decision with which we disagree—it is wholly unsatisfactory that the Government did not sit down, consult the interested parties and produce arrangements that were in the best interests of the industry, the processing companies and the consumers.

I must remind the House that the arrangements are not necessarily permanent. Mr. Leon Brittan sent a letter to the Minister in October 1992 in which he commented on the scheme put forward by the milk marketing boards to replace the statutory arrangements in England and Wales. He wrote:

> "Against this background, and on the basis of the information made available to me, I believe that there are no grounds for action under Articles 85 and 86 with regard to the proposed new co-operative for an initial period of two years".

It cannot be satisfactory for the milk marketing boards to set in place arrangements which are authorised by the Commission for only two years. As the Minister is aware, as soon as the legislation is in place, the Director General of Fair Trading will be entitled to investigate the arrangements for the marketing of wholesale milk in this country. He will be entitled to refer the arrangements to the MMC within two years. It is unsatisfactory for us to go down a road to so much uncertainty.

Much concern has been expressed about the future of the assets of the milk marketing boards, other than the processing arm, Dairy Crest, which will be floated off as a separate company. I am referring to the milk testing arrangements, the national milk records and to Genus which includes the artificial insemination service and the advisory services which have served the industry so well.

It is absolutely fundamental that every producer, regardless of whether he becomes a member of Milk Marque, should have equal access to those services. Those services have been built up by all milk producers, past and present. It would be unfair if the successor to the milk marketing boards were able to take over those services and operate them in a way which discriminated against non-members of Milk Marque. The alternative would be to transfer those activities to another body. I am not suggesting that, but perhaps that point should be considered in Committee. It is crucial that those facilities should be available to all milk producers.

Quota management is another important issue which must be addressed. As a result of the boards, we have a very efficient system of quota management. The big difference between today's milk industry and the industry of 10 years ago is that we have quotas. I accept that there is alarmist talk about the effect of the changes because we have milk quotas. If a very powerful producer co-operative is established against a background of quotas, and there is an under-supply of milk in this country, that body might be able to ratchet the price of milk to unjustified levels. I can assure the Minister that the Labour party will be outraged if the price of milk for consumers is raised unnecessarily as a result of the arrangements.

The Minister described the milk boards as the milk producers' gaoler in this country. I do not know how the Minister can use that description. Only a few years ago, the boards had the overwhelming support not just of the consumers organisations and the Dairy Trade Federation, but also of the milk producers who control the boards. It is nonsense to claim that the boards are the producers' gaoler.

It is equally nonsense to claim that the Potato Marketing Board has shackled our potato producers. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said, it is amazing that the potato producers are determined to retain those shackles. The legislation in respect of potatoes is enabling. Many potato producers and, I suspect, the Potato Marketing Board, received a shock when they discovered that the Government were not simply planning to get rid of the Potato Marketing Board on the basis of EC legislation, but had decided, on the basis of their own independent judgment of what was best for the British potato industry, that the Potato Marketing Board should go.

We do not accept that. We agree with the Minister that the last thing we want is an EC regime for potatoes which includes intervention buying. Open-ended state buying is the bane of the common agricultural policy. We absolutely agree that there should be no question of the Government agreeing to a new potato regime which would allow intervention buying whereby the taxpayer buys potatoes when the market is over-supplied.

However, I do not accept the Minister's arguments. I do not accept that it is automatically a mistake for the producers in this country to choose to manage their market against the background of free trade in potatoes in Europe. There is already a free market in potatoes in the Community. As the Minister has said, the board has accepted that the last vestige of state support for the potato industry—in respect of the contribution that the Treasury is willing to make to part of the Potato Marketing Board's support buying programme—should be removed.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I am enormously puzzled by what the hon. Gentleman has just said. He said that he would oppose a new potato regime in Europe which involved intervention buying. So far as I am aware, the Labour party has always supported the powers that the Potato Marketing Board currently has, and which it has had since the war, to support the market through acreage quotas and intervention buying. Why has the hon. Gentleman suddenly become the first Labour spokesman in my lifetime to speak against intervention buying for the potato sector?

Dr. Strang: I am happy to respond to that point. It is one thing to have a support buying programme financed by a levy on producers. When the Government remove the guarantee, it will be wholly financed by the levy on the industry. We believe that that is correct and appropriate.

As the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) will acknowledge, we have always opposed intervention buying in terms of the CAP. He would probably agree that the old deficiency payments system based on guaranteed prices served this country better than intervention buying. We need only consider the beef market and the hundreds of millions of pounds that are spent buying beef, storing it, freezing it and taking it out at some point in the future. I could refer to other excesses of the CAP, all of which relate to intervention buying.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am still rather confused. Is it Labour party policy that the taxpayer should subsidise a potato buying-up scheme?

Dr. Strang: It is not our policy. We go along with any Government proposals to remove taxpayer support from the potato industry. However, the Potato Marketing Board should stay in place, and the production target area and quotas should be continued, as should all the other work that the board does. That is what the producers want. Against the background of a light EC regime, such a course should be possible.

We shall consider the Minister's arguments very carefully. We shall give close consideration to the reasons for the increased imports of chilled and frozen chips. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that it is in this area that the increase has arisen. One company accounts for 60 per cent. of production in this field. That company has excess capacity in the Netherlands, and there has been penetration of the German market, which does not have quotas, just as there has been penetration of the British market. We shall consider all the arguments objectively. The last thing the Opposition want is constraint of opportunity to invest in processing and thus to create wealth and jobs.

However, we are not persuaded by what we have heard. We agree with the Potato Marketing Board and with potato producers that the board should be allowed to continue. Developments this afternoon in the European Parliament show that there are Conservatives who agree with us and that that Parliament's Agriculture Committee is of the same opinion. It may well be that the Commission can be persuaded to add its support, and then it will be up to the Agriculture Ministers in the Council of Ministers.

I should like to deal now with the removal of the wool guarantee—a decision with which we do not agree. Our judgment is that it is particularly unfortunate that the state-guaranteed price for wool is to be removed. Many hon. Members know that the wool market grew enormously in the 1980s. But then China and Russia withdrew from the market, and there was a huge increase in wool production in New Zealand and, in particular, Australia, where intervention buying was operated. Massive quantities of wool are now held in intervention stores in Italy, and these overhang the market. When prices start to rise, this wool is released, and prices come down. The collapse of the house-building programme in this country has also resulted in a reduction of the demand for wool. Thus, this is the very worst time for removal of the guarantee, which will damage our hill farming industry.

We are concerned that the price a farmer will receive for a clip from a hardy breed will be so low as to make it hardly worth his while. That will not be in the interests of his flock or of the country. There is a very real danger that this change will result in considerable damage to the sheep industry. I hope that it is not too late for the Government to think again and to consider a compromise arrangement whereby there could be some element of continued state support, even if only for a few weeks, to enable the Wool Marketing Board to continue to provide a realistic guarantee. I agree in general with what the right hon. Gentleman said about the board, which has an excellent record with the collection of wool from producers. The board has the support of buyers also.

Clause 44 relates to grants for group marketing. We support the provision. I had hoped that the Minister would announce the provision of some extra money, but in view of the state into which the Government have got the public finances of this country, it is not surprising that there is no such provision.

Finally, I refer to a minor but historic provision tucked away in schedule 5. The right hon. Gentleman himself referred to the repeal of that part of the Agriculture Act 1947 which made provision for an annual review of agriculture. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will remember the importance of the annual review. The negotiations between the farming unions and the Government preceded the setting of national support prices. After we joined the European Community, this became less and less significant, and it is not now practicable to think in terms of an annual national review.

However, the review was indeed a valuable exercise. The agricultural support policies encompassed in the 1947 Act and in the legislation of the 1950s served this country well, enabling people to buy food at world prices. Farmers and farm workers were provided with an effective system of support, and the taxpayer was given value for money.

How different the situation is today. Now, in this country and in the rest of the EC, food is sold at prices well above world levels—indeed, well above levels in the United States. Thousands of millions of pounds are spent on the most inefficient agricultural support system imaginable. Huge mountains of food are bought up, and sometimes commodities are dumped on world markets, to the disadvantage of developing countries, while the common agricultural policy fails to achieve even an adequate means of supporting farmers and the rural economy generally.

The Bill does not address any of the real issues facing the agriculture industry. At best, it fails to confront all the important issues facing agricultural producers and consumers; at worst, it creates arrangements which will be unstable and may in the long term damage consumers and producers. We believe that the milk marketing boards should be adapted, not abolished. We believe that those boards, the Potato Marketing Board and the wool guarantee could still play an important and valuable role in our agriculture industry. For those reasons, the Opposition will vote against the Bill.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) has a good deal of knowledge of agriculture but he got himself into an awful muddle. His apparent opposition to support buying —he said that he would not support a future potato regime that involved such buying—goes wholly against the history of the Labour party in government since the war. Throughout its years in office, the Labour party promoted a support-buying regime for the Potato Marketing Board. Labour Members may say that that system was inherited, but I remind the hon. Gentleman, whose memory seems to be very short, that one of the first actions of Fred Peart, when he became Minister of Agriculture in 1964, was to introduce legislation to deal with the marketing of home-grown cereals.

Indeed, my maiden speech was delivered during a debate on the Cereals Marketing Act 1965, which set up the home-grown cereals authority, with its reserve support-buying capacity. That mechanism, which was introduced by the then Labour government, was never used, but it was available. The price of cereals never dropped to the level at which the scheme would have kicked into operation. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East really must do his homework and must remember what his party stood for in the past.

I want to begin the substance of my speech by making two points. First, I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me for intervening in a debate on agriculture. As he knows, it is almost six years since I was in his seat. During that time I have had many private conversations with him and with his predecessor, both of whom served with me in the Ministry. Over the years, I have very rarely intervened in public. Indeed, I take the view—perhaps rather old-fashioned—that anyone who has had the privilege and honour of holding senior office displays the grossest and most appalling bad manners by breathing down the necks of his successors, especially if they are old colleagues, as soon as they take over. These jobs are difficult enough at the best of times. I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me for intervening after six years. Parts of this Bill are extremely important to my constituents, and I feel that I must make certain comments.

I also want at the beginning to declare my interest—something that I have often done to the House—as a farmer and, in particular, as a grower of potatoes for the processing industry. I just say to the hon. Lady the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) that her intervention, if I may say so, totally misunderstands the modern cult of agricultural marketing, whereby one finds out what the processor and the public want and then produces for that market. If the processor says that the potatoes to be grown should be Record, one grows that particular variety at his insistence, because one is growing for one's customer. That is the way in which agricultural marketing should go in the future.

All my life I have been an enthusiast for managed agricultural markets, by statute if necessary. Farmers are notoriously impossible to organise collectively into marketing their own produce to their own best advantage. The commendable individualism of the farming community is very often a real drawback when it comes to sensible marketing. All my life, therefore, I have supported the milk marketing boards, the Potato Marketing Board and the wool marketing scheme. I was extremely flattered that the Member for Edinburgh, East should have read out so much of what I said so many years ago. In my heart, I still totally subscribe to what I said at that time, and I am not ashamed of saying it.

When I was responsible for these matters, the schemes of the various boards were often attacked, sometimes by the European Commission and sometimes by some of my

[Mr. Michael Jopling]

Cabinet colleagues. It is a matter of some pride to me that, in the four years that I was responsible for these matters, there were very few changes in the marketing boards. I recognise, however, that changes must now be made, and I thought that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East was perhaps not as fair as he might have been in recognising that changes need to be made. There have been challenges from the Community and from the courts, and the Government, quite understandably, must make these changes. It is about the nature of the changes that I want to speak.

I have a good deal of nostalgia for the schemes which are now to be changed, and I have always subscribed to the view that the devil you know is nearly always better than the devil you don't. The big question is how these essential changes can be made while leaving farmers with adequate marketing arrangements so as to give them a fair chance collectively of getting the best price for their produce.

As an example of this, we should recall that the first milk marketing board was set up in the early 1930s, and it became the saviour of thousands of farmers. In the dales and valleys of the north of England, in the west country and in Wales, many small farmers were being driven relentlessly out of business because of their weak, fragmented marketing position.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Sixpence a gallon.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend who has such experience of these matters reminds us of the paltry sums paid for milk in those days.

Today it is appropriate that somebody should pay tribute to the milk marketing boards, because they have done a fine job in spite of some difficulties. I have often thought that the boards could have done considerably better but for what I have always regarded as almost a fatal flaw in their constitution, which made it, in practice, impossible to have adequately skilled business leadership at the head of the boards. If I could have made one change in the constitution of the boards, that would have been it.

However, given the difficulties that successive boards have had, they have done a fine job, of which we can all be proud. My anxiety tonight is that some of these changes could well return dairy farmers to those bad old days. To an extent—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East was right—that cannot happen, given the quota. The quota will make it much more difficult for the various purchasing organisations to hold farmers to ransom and to drive the price down and down, and the existence of milk quotas and the absence of surplus milk production should mean that that is unlikely to happen.

I should very much like to have seen one co-operative, covering England and Wales, to succeed the milk marketing boards, and I welcome the launch of Milk Marque, which I wish every possible success. I am particularly pleased that it has made it clear that it will not discriminate against milk producers on the grounds of size of operation and milk collection or the location of the farm.

Already, other potential buyers have appeared on the scene and, as one who believes in competition, I wish them well, but I hope that the price is not driven down by predatory buyers, as happened between the wars. I urge my right hon. Friend never to forget what happened before the Milk Marketing Board was set up, and always to be prepared to act again if the industry suffers seriously as a result of these changes.

The potato regime is a wholly different set-up. As I said in that speech I made when we were in opposition in the 1970s, the milk marketing board is a very heavy regime, as the sole first buyer of milk, whereas the potato board merely has a reserve right to support-buy. The potato scheme has worked extremely well over the years and, as a potato grower, I am much disappointed that there is a danger of the potato marketing scheme disappearing. There is a free market, which is at times fiercely competitive.

I realise the problems of getting full supplies for the processing industry in this country, and I hope, as a potato grower for processing, that we can in future supply a bigger part of it. I pay tribute to the processors, who have done a great deal to get contracts which are satisfactory to growers. My own son is on the negotiating committee of one of these arrangements. They have been very much in the interests of farmers, producers, processors and the consumer.

Under the potato scheme as it exists, producers and consumers are protected by the quota acreage regime, which has worked well over the years. The Minister has told us that none of the other Ministers in the Council is particularly enamoured of the British scheme. That is a pity, if I may say so, and I urge my right hon. Friend to try just once more to see if he can persuade them of the merits of the British scheme.

I am glad that the Potato Marketing Board supports the Bill. In a letter to me, it wrote:

"The PMB broadly supports the Bill, since it permits a 'successor body' for limited purposes, if the Potato Marketing Scheme (PMS) were to be revoked."

The Minister said that he believes that the potato marketing scheme must be revoked. I was surprised to hear him being as critical of the scheme as he was in his speech. I hope that I can say this to him in a friendly way. I was surprised that he talked that way, in view of the fact that the scheme was reviewed only in 1989 and the producers decided to take up one of the options proposed by the Government at that time.

I was sorry to hear the Minister be somewhat dismissive of the way in which the Potato Marketing Board has been arranging its affairs. I hope that he will not seek to change the Government's defeat in another place. In his speech, he said that the Government would not do that, and that is welcome. It is right that, if the potato marketing scheme must be revoked, the Minister, his successor or whoever, will have to come to the House for a separate decision of the House to revoke the scheme. That is right.

Mr. Gummer: Can I put my right hon. Friend's mind at rest? I want it to be clear in this debate that I am not sheltering behind some decision of the European Community or suggesting that all the fault lies with Brussels. That would be the wrong thing to do. That meant that I had to share with the House my concerns about the future for potato producers in a single market, where it is manifest that we will have an increasing number of imports from outside the United Kingdom. Therefore, I sought to emphasise that side.

I should not like any hon. Member to think that I underestimate the important job done by the Potato Marketing Board in changing itself to be more able to meet the present circumstances. I thought that it was right that the House should not be bamboozled by some suggestion that all the fault lay with Europe and that we all had to do it that way. That would be to hide my fear for the future, on which I felt I should stand honourably when it came to discussing the issue for the benefit of the House.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friend has been characteristically honest and straightforward with the House, and I am glad that he has been able to endorse what he said. Indeed, I said earlier that I recognised the difficulty of British potato producers satisfying the full demands of the processing industry. I was pleased to hear that at least two of the major processors in the United Kingdom have invested in new plant and factories. That is certainly good news. When the successor body is set up, I hope that the Minister and the growers together will be able to find a way in which the growers can fulfil a larger share of the processing market.

I should like to talk about the wool guarantee, which is of tremendous interest and importance to my constituency. I do not need to remind my right hon. Friend of the uncertainties and anxieties in the upland areas at present. He will remember the difficulties we all had when various changes were made to the regime shortly before Christmas. Mercifully and happily, most of those difficulties have been substantially resolved by the Minister being able to use other methods fully to compensate upland sheep farmers.

I simply remind the Minister that wool holds an important, if sometimes rather emotional, place in the minds of upland sheep farmers. If it is the Minister's desire to abolish the guarantee scheme, which has worked well over the years, he should be prepared to use even more sympathetically and realistically the other devices which he has to protect that vital, hard-working group of farmers who do so much to make upland Britain the glory that it is.

The Minister referred to the various devices he has—the hill sheep subsidies, the annual ewe premium and the other premiums through the environmentally sensitive areas scheme, all of which can help dramatically with regard to upland farmers. Therefore, the end of the wool guarantee is not fatal. As the Minister said, that matter will be all right, provided the other arrangements are used.

The Bill causes me some considerable anxieties, which I hope are unfounded. I hope that the Minister can steer farmers into marketing their produce in new ways, which will not seriously disadvantage them. We all understand that changes have to happen. Clearly, those changes need to be made now. Agriculture—probably above all industries in the United Kingdom since the war—has demonstrated its adaptability and inventiveness. Given the new challenges, I have no doubt that it will respond once more.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The House has just listened to a thoughtful, knowledgeable and, I believe, genuinely worried speech from an experienced Member. The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) has had wide experience as an Agriculture Minister. His speech was delivered with all the loyalty that one would expect from a former Government Chief Whip. Nevertheless, I sincerely hope that those on the Government Front Bench were listening to what he had to say, because it was worth listening to.

I must preface my comments by declaring an interest. There are no tatties growing on my farm, but the wool from a flock of more than 700 sheep rightly goes to the British Wool Marketing Board. My second interest is that of the 250 farmers in my constituency of East Lothian, including a substantial number of potato producers and sheep farmers. Sadly, nowadays there are few dairies—it is an east coast constituency.

In common with all hon. Members, my overriding interest is that of the 68,000 consumers of East Lothian whom I represent in the House. The interests of those consumers is well served by the marketing boards which are run in partnership with farming producers. I fear that this Bill could undermine those interests. No one in my constituency has expressed support for the Bill, but a significant number of constituents have expressed genuine fears that the abolition of the marketing boards and the statutory powers provided for in the Bill could be detrimental to the interests of consumers and jeopardise hard-pressed farming businesses in my part of Scotland.

I shall say a few words about milk marketing boards. I understand the genuine difficulties in the milk sector, where the expansion of the commercial activities of milk marketing boards into retailing and processing has created a situation in which independent traders find themselves competing in the retail marketplace with boards which have a statutory monopoly in the wholesale market. That situation can be especially insidious in areas where quota restrictions have created a shortage of milk. I accept that that point must be addressed, but I cannot accept that it is a justification for scrapping the statutory scheme altogether. The scheme has worked extremely well since its inception, and it seems characteristically reckless for the Minister to sweep it away and scrap it altogether.

There may be a fair debate about the detailed operation of the milk marketing boards, but there is no such controversy about either the wool guarantee or the Potato Marketing Board. The threat to destroy those arrangements seems to be undisguised doctrinaire vandalism on the part of the Government. We have seen that before, and we are seeing it again today.

I wish to concentrate on potatoes, but I begin with a few words about the wool guarantee and the statutory powers of the British Wool Marketing Board, which the Minister did not mention in his introductory speech. The Confederation of British Wool Textiles pointed out that this could not be a worse time to remove the guarantee. It warned that removal of the guarantee could lead to dumping and the disruption of the supply of wool to British industry at a time when the industry needs all the help that it can get.

From my limited experience of a hill farm, I know that one is lucky to get 2·5 kg of wool in the fleece of a hill ewe. With the present guarantee price, one gets 90p per kilo, which comes to £2·25 for the fleece of the ewe. Without that guarantee, the net income could drop to 45p per kilo, which is £1·12 for the fleece of a ewe. The sum could easily be as little as £1, or even less.

I therefore agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) that, as it can cost 50p or more to have a sheep clipped, it is not difficult to foresee circumstances in which it would not be worth while to clip sheep in view of the calculations that I have described. So, apart from disrupting the market and depriving our textiles industry of British wool, the proposal could have significant animal welfare implications. I am not aware of anyone who supports the proposal, so why on earth are the Government proceeding with it?

The same criticism can be levelled at the Government's proposals for the Potato Marketing Board. The Government conducted a major review of the potato marketing scheme back in 1989, and rightly reached the conclusion that the basic powers of the Potato Marketing Board, including the vital power to control the area planted, should be left intact. As a result of that review, the board now represents all the interests—not only producers, but processors, consumers and independent representatives. It works efficiently. In the future, the scheme will not cost the taxpayer a penny, so one may well ask why the Government seek to interfere with it.

The only new factor is the possibility of a minimalist proposal for a European Community potato regime, but that is not a genuine justification for the legislation. The potato marketing scheme does not restrict trade in potatoes across the European Community. I suggest that it is a red herring for the Minister of Agriculture or anyone else to suggest that the present system interferes with free trade.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): Perhaps I may clarify the position. The legislation provides for a successor body in the event of the Potato Marketing Board being wound up. If we did not include that provision in the Bill, the only choice would be to continue with the full scheme or wind up the scheme entirely and distribute the assets to the subscribers to the existing Potato Marketing Board. The Bill takes the middle course, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) talked about, of providing for the successor body to carry forward the best of the Potato Marketing Board's activities. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not against that.

Mr. Home Robertson: Indeed not. My concern is that the power is being established to wind up the scheme in the first place. Fair enough, in Committee we must look at ways of making the best of bad job, but my fundamental objection is to the abolition of the board and, in particular, the abolition of the statutory power to control acreage. That is an important power.

I submit that there should be no problem in maintaining our internal scheme for regulating potato production under the principle of subsidiarity which we have debated on the wretched Maastricht Bill. Spain and France also have national support schemes, which cost considerably more than ours cost, at present. As I have said, in future our support scheme would not cost anything under the provisions that the Potato Marketing Board has talked about.

We are dealing with an inherently fragile industry. The potato market is potentially highly volatile.

Mr. John Marshall: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the only area of potato consumption which is growing is processed potatoes? Does he further accept that there has been a significant growth in the import of processed potatoes simply because potato processors can buy potatoes £20 per tonne cheaper in Holland than in Britain?

Mr. Home Robertson: I understand that the processing market is increasing. There is nothing to stop the Potato Marketing Board taking advantage of that—as I am sure it will, if it is allowed to continue.

I return to my fundamental point—that we are dealing with a fragile industry which should not be messed about for purely doctrinaire reasons. If planting in the United Kingdom increased beyond the current quota of 155,000 hectares, there would almost certainly be a glut of potatoes on the market. The market would be flooded. Fair enough, consumers would have the short-term benefit of very cheap potatoes for perhaps a year, until the inevitable shortage followed as producers were forced out of business. I fear that that would be particularly the case in the more remote areas of the country, especially Scotland, which are further from the processors to which the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) referred, and from other parts of the mass market.

Conversely, if planting fell below the quota which has been carefully calculated by the Potato Marketing Board, there would be a shortage of potatoes and market prices would rise inexorably, contrary to the interests of consumers, processors and everyone else. It is precisely to avoid such dangerous fluctuations in a capital and labour-intensive industry that the potato marketing scheme was established in the first place. I say again that it would be reckless to scrap it now.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will know that, in the present circumstances, the Potato Marketing Board is paying £10 per tonne for potatoes. In other words, the price is at rock bottom, even with the scheme in existence. It may well be the case that next year fewer potatoes will be planted, as indeed there have been fewer potato producers year on year simply as a result of the market conditions within the scheme. So the hon. Gentleman should not draw too much of a comparison between conditions inside and outside the scheme.

Mr. Home Robertson: I gently remind the Minister that the position is even worse in the free market paradise that he is so happy about on the other side of the English channel. The Potato Marketing Board has achieved a great deal in the way of stability. Certainly there are difficulties just now, but the position would be far worse without the safeguards that the board can provide.

The House will have gathered that I am not particularly impressed by the representations of the Potato Processors Association. There are just 33 processors. Crisping, freezing and dehydrating processes now constitute 37 per cent. of the consumer market. There may be only 33 potato processors, but they have a highly lucrative share of the market. I went downstairs earlier today and bought myself a 30 g packet of crisps. It cost 20p. According to my basic arithmetic, that comes to £6,666·66 a tonne. Compare that with what my local Co-op charges for potatoes—85p for a 5lb bag. That comes to £380 a tonne, which is still a great deal more than the £10 a tonne which the Minister said was paid by the board to producers just now.

The profit margin of rogues who want to destroy the potato marketing scheme are put into fair perspective by the figures that I have given. They want an even bigger profit margin for their 37 per cent. of the market, at the risk of creating chaos in the fresh potato market which, let us not forget, is still 63 per cent. of the trade. I suggest that the processors should be seen in much the same light as the monopolistic supermarket chains. They can have an anti-competitive role and can be a bottleneck in the market, controlled by a handful of powerful companies which all too often operate against the interests of both consumers and producers.

Who are the voracious chippers and freezers who have so much influence with the Conservative Government? I understand that fully 60 per cent. of the British chip market has been cornered by a single company—McCain. I long to know how it and the 32 other members of the Potato Processors Association—a tiny group of people—have influenced the Government to undermine the interests of every housewife in the nation, not to mention every potato producer. I think it stinks. It seems to me that it is either a case of mad Minister disease or, more likely, corrupt politician disease. How much has McCain or other members of the Potato Processors Association contributed directly or indirectly to Conservative party funds? That is a subject which ought to be addressed. It is a question being put to me by potato producers in my constituency.

The potato marketing scheme is serving the interests of consumers well. It is regulating the industry. It is improving the quality and the marketing of potatoes and it will not cost the taxpayer anything at all. It would be sheer madness to destroy that scheme. To talk about "shackling the market", as the Minister did earlier, does not make sense, but sadly it is not unheard of for the Tory majority in this House——

Mr. Curry: Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Home Robertson: No, I am just concluding and I want to let other people take part.

It is not unheard of for the Tory majority in this House to vote for sheer madness, and I fear that they are going to do it again tonight.

6.50 pm

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East): The speech of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) started pleasantly enough, and was thoughtful and provoking, but then he appeared to go completely off the rails. His constituency covers the whole range of farming. I could not help feeling a little envious, because he was able to speak on potatoes, milk and wool. My constituency is a flat fenland area, and I shall restrict my remarks to the part of the Bill relating to potatoes.

Potato growing has gone through significant changes in the last decade, involving massive investment, particularly in things like cropping and husbandry, in modern refrigerated storage, in grading, packaging and marketing for the retail sector for the consumer and for the processor. Potatoes are a vital crop in arable areas such as north-east Cambridgeshire, particularly with the CAP reforms which are looming on the horizon, and also with the GATT negotiations attacking agricultural prices and the generally anticipated lower incomes from historically staple crops such as wheat, sugar beet and oil seed.

The Potato Marketing Board and the scheme have served producers and consumers extremely well. They are not perfect, but they have responded to pressures to reform in the past and are willing to do so again. It would seem quite unreasonable to revoke them under this Bill without giving them the opportunity to meet the new requirements of a modern EC marketplace.

The PMS has adapted to these changing conditions by expanding target areas to accommodate the growth sectors in the industry—notably, the export market, processing and pre-packing. As I have said, many growers have invested heavily in potato storage and specialised equipment, because this is a highly capital-intensive sector. They will feel badly let down if the Government scrap the PMS and give them a period of uncertainty. That is the last thing they need at this time of heavy investment.

The potato clauses—22 to 43—seem to have been stimulated by EC proposals to introduce a potato regime which the Council of Agriculture Ministers hopes to approve some time later this year. It is meant to be a light regime, probably intended to guard against increased imports from eastern Europe but it does not give the Commission power to intervene in the potato market and makes no mention at all of national support schemes.

If these are the main ingredients of the proposals, many people, including my potato growers and farmers, may question whether it is worth having any EC regime at all, since it will do so little. Is there a hidden agenda, I wonder, to prevent a shift into potatoes by arable farmers who may become dissatisfied, after a few years, with set-aside? After all, the EC's record is strong on quotas. How can we discount the introduction of quotas in future if these proposals lead to chronic over-production?

The EC Council regulation says:

"appropriate measures should therefore be taken to ensure stability of the market and a fair income for the producers concerned".

Those are laudable aims, but it is highly questionable whether the proposals will achieve this.

According to the explanatory memorandum, it is "proposed that a common organisation for potatoes be established, based on the following principles: The common market organisation should not interfere with the market forces".

It defines this as:

"Only a potato market whose principal regulative is the play of supply and demand will make sure that production takes place in the most efficient way and that consumers do not have to pay unduly high prices."

I ask, what is the evidence for any market distortion within the EC? After all, potatoes are freely traded. A free market already exists beyond the farm gate. In this country alone, 14,000 growers compete with each other to sell their products. Purchasing power of the supermarket chains and processors in the market place is extremely powerful. There are no restrictions on imports from other EC countries, so United Kingdom farmgate prices and quality have to remain competitive with the price and quality of imports.

The Minister mentioned the natural barrier of the channel, and transport costs of about £30 a tonne. There is no question but that there is a free market and that EC producers already have a massive hurdle to clear with the costs of transport across the channel.

The second principle is

"The market position of potato growers should be improved."

We would all say aye to that. It says:

"Farmers growing potatoes should be given an incentive to market their produce through a producer group."

We are now on to setting up co-operatives and it goes on later to talk about 1·5 million ecu in grant aid to enable this to happen. Nobody will say no to that either, but that does not, in any shape or form, strike against the modus operandi of the potato marketing scheme.

The third principle—this is perhaps the rub—is:

"There should be a common approach in trade with third countries. Imports from third countries, under normal circumstances, should not be subject to any other restriction than the Common Customs Tariff. However, if there is a significant rise in imports which could endanger the Community market then import licences may be requested. These licences serve the purpose of observing the market more closely."

Does this not have a definite ring of intervention, to control supply and hence to control price? How ironic it would be if we were to replace our own successful system for price stability with one from Brussels.

Frankly, the proposals seem designed to accommodate the complaints voiced by the processors. It has been argued that processors are having to import, particularly from Holland, because United Kingdom prices are too high, but the evidence is to the contrary. In four out of the five years since 1987-88, the Great Britain average spot price for potatoes was well below that of Dutch potatoes. I have a table showing that, in 1988-89, our spot price was something like £44·93 per tonne, while in the Netherlands it was £54·79, and so it goes on.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend might be interested in a sentence from an answer I had from our hon. Friend the Minister of State this afternoon:

"In the Netherlands potatoes are currently £27 to £32 per tonne compared to £25 to £50 per tonne (depending on variety) in Great Britain."

It goes on to explain that that is more than doubling the level of processed imports in the past decade. Surely the figures are not as he says they are?

Mr. Moss: As the Minister of State stated, or as I stated? I am not quite sure what my hon. Friend means.

Mr. Marshall: As he stated.

Mr. Moss: As I stated? The evidence is there for all to see. I shall be happy to supply it to my hon. Friend later.

Dutch exports are greatest to Germany, which consistently has lower prices than the Netherlands. Does that not prove that Dutch export penetration is not related to the raw potato price or to the existence of a potato marketing scheme here? Dutch success in penetrating markets is more a reflection of the overall structure and performance of the Dutch processing sector compared to that of their competitors, rather than a reflection of the price of raw potato imports.

In the current year, there has been substantial over-production in this country, and in the Netherlands, France and Belgium; hence the low prices that we are seeing. The average price from August last year to January this year in the United Kingdom was around £40 per tonne, compared with average prices in the Netherlands of £30 per tonne, France £32 and Belgium £20. Although the United Kingdom prices at this level are still well below production costs, they were held above disaster levels by the action of the PMS—first, the stabilisation effects of the quota and, secondly, grower-funded floor price intervention.

Looking at this evidence, it is very difficult to disagree with my potato growers that the potato marketing scheme works and has prevented them from suffering the catastrophic prices of their Belgian counterparts. No wonder many EC potato producers are looking enviously at our PMS system and secretly wishing for something similar.

However, I have some sympathy with the processors. I recently visited a processing factory in my constituency, known as Garden Isle Foods. They complained to me more about the security of supplies of potatoes of the right quality and in the right quantity than about the price they have to pay. They need a guaranteed supply of these potatoes to ensure proper and efficient planning of their industrial throughput. They told me that, on one occasion last year, they were unable to buy forward at any price from any merchant. The story that came down the line from the co-operatives was they had not been empowered by their directors to sell potatoes on a rising market. There is plenty of scope here for the PMS and the growers to get their act together to make sure that the processors do not come forward with unnecessary complaints.

From my discussions with my potato growers and with the processors, who are a very important part of the industrial scene in my constituency, I do not think that the two sides are a million miles apart. There needs to be better co-operation between them, and better co-ordination, and certainly increased investment by the producers and the merchants, particularly in areas such as grading and storage.

Size is of vital importance to processors. Grading is still a farm-based activity, and is often too unreliable to meet the requirements of the modern specifications of the fast food industry. Producers need to consider the market requirements in a more professional manner. It is no longer good enough to expect processors to take surplus production of the wrong types of potatoes which have been rejected as unacceptable by the supermarkets and the packers.

The potato industry, in all its parts, is working reasonably well. It is certainly profitable, given production figures over a reasonable number of years, and it works without subsidy. I have not heard any overwhelmingly persuasive arguments that this replacement by a lightweight EC regime will bring any real competitive advantages.

The Bill as it stands is certainly acceptable, but I caution the Minister against the exercise of his powers under clause 22, particularly if, as he has said, he is not responding to proposed EC regulatory changes.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I apologise for detaining the House, but earlier today, when Madam Deputy Speaker was in the Chair, I brought to her attention on a point of order the fact that the Secretary of State for the Environment proposed to hold a press conference at 10 o'clock tomorrow on the future of the east Thames corridor, and that documents were not yet available in the House of Commons Library. I drew attention to the fact that policy statements were to be made to the press before they were reported to the House.

In the past half hour, there has become available in the Library a question and reply, which I have furnished to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, which indicate that the Government's approach to the matter—that is, the east Thames corridor development—will be published tomorrow at 10 am. That coincides with the press conference of the Secretary of State for the Environment, also at 10 am, on a major development issue affecting millions of people in south-east England.

Is it not possible for Government Front-Benchers to arrange for a Minister to come here at 10 o'clock tonight and make the statement to which the House is entitled on this major issue, before it is reported to the press? It seems to me to be very important that this matter is reported and a statement made to the House, so that hon. Members on all sides can question the Minister on this development.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, I wonder if you could take this up with Madam Speaker. On 17 February this year, Madam Speaker made a comment about a similar set of circumstances that had been drawn to her attention. The hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) raised a point with her about hon. Members releasing to the press the content of a speech intended to be made during a debate in the Chamber and allowing it to be published as if it had been made, although it was never made in the Chamber. Madam Speaker said:

"If what the hon. Gentleman says is correct—I have no reason to believe otherwise—I hope that the practice will cease forthwith. I caution the House that any speech which is not published in Hansard, although it may be published elsewhere, is not a parliamentary proceeding and is therefore not privileged. All hon. Members should be made aware of that."—[Official Report, 17 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 322.]

That deals, of course, with the question of absolute privilege with regard to any action for libel, but the principle is the same. Madam Speaker was deprecating information being given outside as though it had been given here in the House. Certainly, with the response to a parliamentary question, the impression is given that it is a parliamentary occasion, whereas clearly the information is being given in a press conference. It really is contempt by the Government, who have been in office far too long, for the House since their accountability is primarily to the House, not to the media.

Mr. John Marshall: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it not the case that the Secretary of State for the Environment is due here at 2.30 tomorrow afternoon to answer questions for one hour?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Further to that point of order Madam Deputy Speaker. I realise that you are not in a position to require Ministers to make statements, but in the past, as has been said in the House, Madam Speaker has deprecated this practice of making significant statements in that way. This is not an incident; it is a very important statement. It really shows profound disrespect to the House that we are not to have a statement from the responsible Minister tomorrow, before the press gets hold of the information.

I wonder whether, since there happens to be an Environment Minister on the Front Bench, he might seek to catch your eye so that he can explain whether we are to have an opportunity to investigate this matter tomorrow with the Minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): As this matter was raised with Madam Speaker earlier today, I think it best that I report to her what has been said. She will in due course, no doubt, make her views known, if she so wishes. I cannot, obviously, bind her by anything I might say. Members will be aware, of course, that it is not for the Chair to require Ministers to come to the House and make statements—a point that one hon. Member has already made.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. I have already dealt with the matter sufficiently. Mr. Paul Tyler.

7.7 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I have no direct interest in farming, but I have a very considerable interest in the future of the rural economy, the rural environment and rural employment opportunities, and this Bill is very relevant to them.

Many farmers today, faced with the complexity, confusion and constant flux which surround their industry, must have some sympathy for the view of Gaius Petronius in the year 66 AD. I am sure that the Minister knows it well, as I believe that he studied either classics or theology and it is very relevant to both. Gaius Petronius said:

"We trained hard—but it seemed that every time we were beginning to form into teams, we would be reorganised. I was to learn later in life that we tend to meet any new situation by reorganising, and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress, while producing confusion, inefficiency and demoralisation."

The House and the Government have indulged in that all too often.

This Bill is obviously a very important opportunity. Indeed, it may be the last best chance for the farming industry. If it is approached in the right way, it could be a springboard for real opportunity, but if it is to create a new straitjacket for restriction it will doom the industry not to better marketing opportunities but to worse ones. That is why we Liberal Democrats come to the debate in a spirit of reasoned amendment rather than outright opposition.

One of the most unpleasant and unfortunate implications of the proposals before us is that because it is so difficult to plan ahead in this industry in the very uncertain world of agricultural marketing the Minister has had to take to himself a number of enabling powers for implementation at a later date. We understand the problem, and let us not fool ourselves that it is easy to get around it, but the House is entitled to know the circumstances in which the enabling powers will be exercised; that is the crux of the issue. If it is to be in the context of an increasing discrepancy between farm gate prices and the prices that the consumer pays, and of nothing being done to reduce that discrepancy, the Bill will be counter-productive.

In the past 10 years, retail food prices have risen by 52 per cent., but the retail price index has risen by 70 per cent., which means that in the past decade food prices have actually fallen in real terms. As any farmer knows, in the same period farm gate prices have increased by only 18 per cent., so farmers have contributed greatly to United Kingdom consumers' standard of living by helping to reduce the real cost of food.

Farm gate prices actually fell in the years 1985, 1988 and 1991, but in no year in the past decade have retail prices fallen. In the decade 1982 to 1992 the producer price of milk, the central feature of the Bill, has increased by 45·5 per cent., but over the same period the shop price has increased by more than 70 per cent., so the margin has increased rather than reduced.

The farm gate prices for lamb—which are relevant to the income from wool—have decreased, but the shopper has not seen a similar reduction, as the retail price has increased by 26·5 per cent. or more than a third. Against that background, concerns have been expressed in all parts of the House about the impact of the Bill on the viability and vitality of the agriculture industry. In the past decade there has been low or even no growth in real farm incomes in most sectors. Last week's Ministry figures showed that:

"In real terms cash flow has remained virtually unchanged".

Throughout the decade there have been considerable and continuous supermarket price rises. Despite the recession, food retailing has been one of the most successful and profitable sectors of the economy. It has also been one of the most generous contributors to Conservative party election funds.

The effect of the Bill on individual sectors will clearly be the litmus test for many farmers and for the consumer, and I turn to the three sectors principally covered by the Bill. The hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) all raised serious concerns about potatoes. It is clear that there is no imperative from Brussels for the scrapping of the board or the scheme. The Minister has been clear, open and honest about that, but there seems to be some doubt in the minds of some of his hon. Friends, because every so often up pops the ogre of Brussels as the rationale for change.

The Minister, as President of the Council of Agriculture Ministers in the latter six months of last year a very important person, was in an extremely important position to drive forward the Community's own regime. The problem now is not so much the merits of the present scheme versus the new scheme as the fact that we are being asked to buy what could be decribed as a potato in a poke. We do not know what regime will operate. It it possible that in the long term it could be very satisfactory, but there is an old saying, "If it works, don't fix it." Until we see a real improvement in the type of regime that is developed, it is open to many people to express scepticism about the nature of the transition, its speed and its timing.

We heard sensible cautionary words from a number of Conservative Members about the nature of the successor body, which is not specified at this time. We welcome the fact that Ministers have agreed to maintain—in substance, they say—the good work of our noble Friends in another place, but many of us will be concerned to ensure that parliamentary scrutiny is guaranteed and will not be watered down.

At the end of the day, there seem to be remarkably few people in any part of the industry—producers, consumers, retailers or wholesalers—apart from the processors, who want to make the proposed change. As a number of hon. Members on all sides of the House have said, there seem to be some major question marks about the way in which the potato scheme is being driven forward. We need reassurance.

We all know that in areas such as my constituency in the south-west, and the constituency of the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, wool now represents only a small part of the overall income of sheep and hill farmers, but taking away the guaranteed price will halve what is already a very low price. The average price paid to farmers at the moment is 117p per kilo, which will drop to about 60p per kilo when the world market price is introduced. There are still 98,000 wool producers in Britain, many of them clinging on in a difficult situation, eking out a minimal existence. Farming in the hills and the least-favoured areas continues to be one of the most vulnerable sectors of the farming industry. To lose the security of that small part of their income at this stage would be extremely unfortunate.

As the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said with characteristic understatement, there was some concern and anxiety from those parts of the country about the hill livestock compensatory allowances, but it was a great deal more than that. There was real anger from those areas because they felt that their interests were not being understood and that the position they came from, which was a steady deterioration in their income, although it was increasing somewhat in the current year, was not widely recognised within the Ministry.

We know that the proposal is not new and has been widely forecast, but for the Government at this time to take powers in the Bill to destroy what is left of the guaranteed wool market when it is at its weakest, without anything to take its place, seems to give precisely the wrong signals to the most vulnerable sector in the farming community. I remind the Minister that, according to his Department's figures published last week, there have been only modest rises in the incomes of hill livestock farmers, while in Scotland they have continued to fall for the second year running. As a minimum, the sector is entitled to ask that revocation be delayed for two years to allow the market to recover.

It is rumoured that the Government are planning to circumvent the whole process of parliamentary scrutiny and to use a statutory instrument to lower wool guaranteed prices to zero prior to the passage of the Bill. It is not for us to insist that the timing of the Bill should be brought forward—that is up to the Minister—but we could legitimately ask for a delay until that specific issue has been debated properly. It seems unlikely that the Bill will be enacted before the end of April, so surely the guarantee should continue for a full clip year and avoid disruption and unfair treatment to sheep farmers.

On the main issue in the Bill—milk—it is of critical importance that a "very heavy regime", to use the words of one hon. Member, should be replaced with an equally effective regime, if all the advances in the sector are not to be put at risk. If the Bill provides an effective co-operative organisation for the dairy sector, with real muscle in the marketplace—comparable with the co-operatives which work so well for producers in most other member states of the Community—it could be the springboard for the improvement that I referred to at the outset.

We accept that the vertical integration of the English and Welsh boards into a single co-operative would create a body which had the potential to be too monopolistic. In principle, the proposals of the milk marketing boards for Milk Marque are therefore along the right lines. We do not believe that Dairy Crest can be incorporated within that organisation and agree that it should be floated, but there is a problem with timing. If the Diary Crest flotation is delayed beyond the vesting day for Milk Marque, the market could be distorted during the transitional period. We must have safeguards to ensure that that does not happen, and that there is no conflict of interest. Too long a transitional period could be damaging and could fatally compromise the new system.

Scotland is very different. The latest figures from the Ministry show that dairy farming incomes in Scotland continue to fall, in contrast with other areas. With the three boards, the proportional and actual scale of operations are somewhat different. Despite earlier exchanges, I believe that there is a good case for the Minister to seek the co-operation of his colleague the President of the Board of Trade, who has just set a precedent by overturning an Office of Fair Trading recommendation on Owners Abroad, to reconsider the reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and the provision that the Scottish milk marketing boards should not be allowed to engage in any production. It must be obvious that the milk production set-up in Scotland must be different from that in England and Wales, not merely for historic reasons but because of the state of that sector of the industry north of the border. I hope that the Minister will also be able to reassure us that the Government will allow the constitution of a separate Scottish development council for milk.

The last thing we want is for the new milk co-operatives to be so constrained from the outset that they are not able to work for the full benefit of their members, to enable them to survive and to compete in the single market. Since January, the economic context of the industry has completely changed and it must surely be only a matter of time before some of the enterprising producer co-operatives in other member states target our market. After all, many cases of them have generous backing from investment by their Governments.

It is extremely important to us that the Minister, with other Ministers in the Community, should consider the problems of quota allocations now. It is a high priority, which should be resolved before completion of the change to the new marketing system. Either more quota should be allocated to member states such as the United Kingdom, whose home market suffers from a major deficit—we are importing liquid milk now into this country—or we should allow quota to be traded across member state boundaries, which might prove preferable. If our dairy industry is as efficient and productive as it has shown itself to be in the recent past—which I believe to be the case—that could only work to our advantage, and we should consider it urgently.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's second suggestion is Government policy. We are in favour of trading quotas across borders. That is one way in which one can make the quota system more flexible and sensible and make it react properly to the market. The sadness is that we are unique. That is a European view, and as good Europeans we ought to do that to attempt to ensure that milk production takes place in those countries most suited to it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will help us by ensuring that members of his fellow parties in Europe start to support that policy, as until now they have been implacably opposed to it.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the Minister for his intervention—and all power to his elbow during the negotiations. It is a great pity that more advance was not made in that direction when he was in the driving seat in the Council of Ministers. Surely with the change in our milk marketing we can start to press for such an initiative.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps the policy that we have adopted—which, as I understand it, is the free movement of unrestricted quotas—has been the problem with our European partners. If the Government were to take the view that there should be some control and restriction on the amount of quota which could move across boundaries, our European partners might be more amenable to the suggestion.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. No doubt he will develop that theme later in the debate, and it may be better for me to leave it to him to do so.

Quota management is an important issue. I think that it is fair to say that the sector was orginally sceptical of the value of the introduction of quotas, but the system is now working reasonably well and therefore any major change in quota management will inevitably cause concern for the reasons that I have advanced. For that reason—in Committee, or by whatever means appropriate—I hope that the Minister will be able to guide us on the current thinking on quota management before the Bill reaches the statute book. Little guidance is given in the Bill or in any statements made by Ministers during its passage in the other place or today to guide us on how it will operate, and clearly there are different views of the extent to which Milk Marque, as the successor body but one which does not represent 100 per cent. of producers, should be involved in the exercise.

We want a producer co-operative, but not as a fallback position: we want a potential ground breaker which will establish itself as a strong marketing co-operative to match those in other member states. From our experience of agriculture in other member states, we know how effective producer co-operatives are. They are prepared to use their marketing muscle in the market place and to prevent the sort of domination of buying power which results in this country from a small number of processors and supermarkets. A co-operative with the ability to compete in the world of the giants—the supermarket chains and food processors—would be a benefit to producers and consumers. By cutting back on the bargaining power of the middle men there is no reason why retail food prices should not fall.

Speaking with all the authority of a former Minister, the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale referred to the individualistic tendencies of farming communities, and there are no more individualistic farmers than those in my area of Cornwall. This is the time for us to stimulate, encourage and cajole, by every means possible, to ensure that they work together in co-operation.

In the long term, the Milk Marque pioneer should be able to expand into other commodities. Why should it not expand into potatoes, wool or eggs, where we desperately need producer co-operatives to give more muscle to producers vis-a-vis those who buy from them? By that means, we could develop a multi-product group to market the best of British produce, and it would certainly command more confidence and respect than the inadequately funded Food from Britain organisation.

The Minister referred to liberating creative potential, and there are opportunities to do that. In the case of both potatoes and wool, however, the Bill seems to be too early, too drastic, and lacking in realistic provisions to enable a transition to a well-managed market. On milk, the Bill is still too sketchy and the sector is understandably concerned about what may happen. The Bill retains a distinctive whiff of Thatcherite philosophy, offering little prospect of real competition to the dominance of the supermarkets, and putting too much potential power into the hands of the Minister. It will need radical revision in Committee.

This is not the Bill for which we hoped and expected. If we are presented with a real Bill which achieves the sort of objectives about which hon. Members have been talking today, we can all support it. I hope that the House or the Standing Committee will be able to improve the Bill, but I have no more confidence in the Government's policies at present than, I believe, agriculture has.

7.30 pm

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): My interest in manufacturing and industrial issues, as well as, of course, consumer matters is well known, and leads me to contribute to today's debate in two ways—first, in relation to wool, as chairman of the all-party wool textile group and, secondly, in relation to milk, as someone who has been closely involved with the industry for many years. I declare an interest as my husband is employed by one of Britain's largest dairy companies, with which I am in regular contact on a range of issues. I am happy to leave the future of the potato board to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss), who made an interesting speech on that subject.

At first glance, the Bill, as it relates to wool, milk and potatoes, seems straightforward with no controversial issues—but nothing could be further from the truth. The bill is a privatisation Bill to remove Government involvement from the market for those commodities. I fully support privatisation as it gives a new boost to industry, but if we privatise, we must do so properly—something which the Bill does not appear to do.

One aspect of the Bill will have a serious effect on the wool industry and wool producers, which will, in turn, affect our textile industry—the measure to terminate the guaranteed wool price from 1 May this year. As has been said, that guaranteed wool price will disappear before the Bill has completed its passage through the House. The main purpose of the guaranteed price has been to give stability to wool producers, which it has done for 40 years. The cost to the Government has been small, and the stability continued until the world collapse in wool prices in 1990.

The stability created by the guaranteed price has allowed the British wool clip to improve in quality and image, and turn itself into an internationally recognised fibre. There are licensees all over the world, and there is representation in Japan, which is now one of the biggest consumers of British wool. The existence of the guaranteed price has helped to develop an efficient structure for the collection, distribution and promotion of British wool. That structure is the envy of many European countries and it was the basis of the system now operating in South Africa.

The guaranteed price has served producers in the less-favoured and remote areas of this country particularly well. More than half of British wool is exported, either in greasy, scoured or top form. Much of the processing takes place in Yorkshire, and Scotland and the borders. The stability created by the guaranteed price has ensured a constant supply of wool into the wool industry which, at present, is increasing its exports, both in terms of value and quantity. The guaranteed price has helped to secure employment in those areas. That has been a particularly important factor as the textile industry has declined over the years.

The existence of the guaranteed price has been of great value in preserving the environment and countryside. The British Wool Marketing Board, the Confederation of British Wool Textiles and the National Farmers Union have repeatedly asked the Government to maintain the guaranteed price until 1995 to allow time for the industry to recover from the unprecedented difficulties resulting from the international wool crisis of 1990-91.

There is still a big discrepancy between supply and demand, and the reduction in world stockpiles could take two or three more years. If the guaranteed wool price is removed this year, as proposed, producer returns will fall by almost half, which will compound the hardship recently experienced by sheep farmers. There could not be a worse time to remove the guaranteed price as, due to the international stock piles, world prices are at their lowest level in real terms.

At today's market prices, many grades or breeds of wool have no commercial value. They could disappear and be lost from the market when prices recover. Like the milk cheque, the wool cheque is important to farmers, even though it does not amount to much. It is an important source of income to producers, particularly those in hill and remote areas.

The sheep industry has been depressed and uncertain for some years. The loss of the guaranteed price will compound the problems. As many sheep farmers say, their incomes are being reduced. I understand that a farmer in Bedfordshire—an area that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know well—receives less for a whole lamb complete with fleece than I pay for one leg in the butchers. That discrepancy shows that there is something wrong in the market.

Production will be lost to third world countries, which will affect textile manufacturing output, and employment in areas that are already suffering due to competition from cheap overseas labour. Exports will be lost and there will be an increase in imported wool. Both factors will affect the balance of payments. There may even be a switch back to synthetic fibres, which could cause environmental problems. Shearing and dipping will be discouraged—we have already heard about the cost of shearing sheep—which will have an effect on the general welfare of the national flock. Environmental problems could be caused as sheep shed their wool all over the countryside. We all know the importance of maintaining the countryside, but it could suffer.

The importance of sheep farming should not be understated. The quality and image of the clip will suffer, and the present system of collection, distribution and promotion could be undermined. We all know that promotion is important—both the British Wool Marketing Board at its headquarters at Clayton, Bradford, and the Confederation of British Wool Textiles must both be complimented on their work in that sector. If the British Wool Marketing Board carries large stockpiles of wool into a post-guarantee period, producers will have to bear the cost of holding stocks inherited from the guaranteed price regime.

I shall call on the Minister—when he returns to his seat—to reconsider the issue and, at the very least, to extend the scheme until May 1995 when we hope that the wool market will be in better shape. Wool producers need the Minister's help, and they need it now. Perhaps as the Minister is busy in discussions, he will read Hansard tomorrow to see what I am saying.

When we see how milk is treated in the Bill, its true nature comes to light. It is an enabling Bill which leaves the action to the Minister. It is a sort of Arthur Daley Bill which suggests, "Trust me, guv'nor." I am not sure that many of us would buy a used car from Arthur Daley, and I leave my colleagues to gather the inference from my words.

Surprisingly, the Bill requires only the milk marketing boards to come up with schemes to reorganise the industry—the Minister then has to agree to those schemes. The Minister has no obligation to publish the schemes or consult anyone else in the industry. That does not constitute democracy, but provides a potential abuse of power.

I hear that there is already a mood within the milk marketing boards merely to change the letterhead, repaint the trucks, get rid of a few troublesome milk producers and carry on as before. That is patently unsatisfactory. The Minister should be obliged to consult the milk purchasers, retailers and consumer organisations. We are all consumers. Perhaps not all my colleagues do the weekly shopping, but their partners, wives, sons and daughters may do so—we are all consumers and all ultimately pay the prices. Such groups should be consulted by the Minister before he gives his approval to a reorganisation scheme. I am sure that, if the Minister were advising me on the reorganisation of my now infamous mythical whelk stall, he would at least take into account—I hope—the views of my customers. I suggest that he does the same in this case.

I should like to spend a moment discussing the competition aspects of the Bill. It is here that the issue of privatisation comes into play. The milk marketing board in England and Wales has already proposed that it should be converted to a milk brokerage, Milk Marque, aiming to control 80 per cent. of milk from farms. Its equivalent in Scotland proposes to operate an integrated milk brokerage and dairy business, with more than 50 per cent. of the market in Scotland. Clearly, we have competition on our hands, and it could be an issue from the very first vesting day.

It reminds me of the problems that we have had with privatisation in the energy market. We have privatised gas and we are allowing a monopoly to continue, restricted only by an efficient and tough regulator—and even he suggests change. In the electricity industry, there is an inefficient regulator who has been unable to prevent the industry from falling into disorder. If I were to use any more such examples, I am sure that the Chair would quickly rule me out of order, but we have adequate supplies of energy in this country, and a great deal of milk, so we should not have to import either.

I am advised that Milk Marque, the potential monopoly, has already announced the non-negotiated price at which it will supply dairies as from 1994. I understand the proposed price is 20 per cent. higher than current prices. I cannot see the British housewife wanting to pay 20 per cent. more for milk just because the Government are allowing a monopoly to develop. I trust that the consumer organisations will pick up this point and discuss it forcefully with the Minister.

Not only will Milk Marque attempt to set prices that bear no relation to the market; it also reserves the right to ration supplies, presumably to impose its own prices. That strikes me as a potential abuse of a monopoly position, and we do not want references to the Office of Fair Trading or the Monopolies and Mergers Commission early in the new scheme. I sincerely hope that it will not encourage British dairies to import raw material supplies from northern France, as we do with French electricity, or British farmers will be very cross. I know that the chairman of Northern Foods has already described the massive investment that that company will make in plant in this country once he knows what the Minister's views and actions will be. I would certainly not want him to go away with the idea that it would be much better if he invested money in jobs in northern France rather than here.

We want our industry here. I want British electricity in our power system and British milk on my cornflakes. I expect the Minister to ensure that I and future generations will have it.

The Bill must deal with the competition aspect. We cannot just leave it to the Minister to sort out the industry as best he can. Limits must be placed on the size and form of any milk marketing board successor established as a result of the Bill. The Bill must also set limits on the size of any future milk brokerage. We cannot rely on a regulator with the title of Ofmilk. That would do nothing to encourage our British industry. In any case, our regulators are only partly successful, and there is no reason to suppose that they would do any better in this industry.

We have made a botch of some of our privatisations, and we must not make a botch of milk reorganisation. Most people need milk every day of their lives and like it delivered to their doorsteps, so the legislation needs to be framed to promote competition and prevent the need for intervention by the OFT or the EC Commission.

I understand that certain services are of significance to British dairy farmers and the dairy industry. They have already been mentioned, but I shall mention them again so as to leave the Minister in no doubt about the concern felt. The services are artificial insemination, milk testing and milk recording. These services are currently provided by the milk marketing boards. I understand that Milk Marque has assumed that they and their assets would be vested in the new organisation.

That would be unsatisfactory. Some milk producers will not be trading with Milk Marque. They will sell to other organisations or direct to dairies—but they will need the benefit of those services. For reasons of commercial confidentiality, those producers will be reluctant to use the services if they remain within Milk Marque—and who could blame them?

Moreover, the same farmers have a claim on the assets used by all those services, in the form of farms, offices, laboratories and means of transport. Milk producers have contributed to their cost for many years, so they should remain freely available for use by all milk producers. The services are critical to British dairy farming and should therefore be moved to independent control—to the Agricultural Development Advisory Service, to a commercial organisation or even to a non-profit-making trust.

The milk producers who do not trade with Milk Marque also have a claim on other MMB assets—the land and property at Thames Ditton, at regional offices and at depots and farms around the country. The property belongs to all milk producers; they have all paid for it over the years they have been members of the scheme. It would be most unfair if the benefit of these properties fell into the lap of a single milk brokerage.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The hon. Lady will be aware that many people have stopped producing milk. How can they get their share of all this back?

Mrs. Peacock: The hon. Gentleman, who has been in the House longer than I have, knows how to tackle the Minister on that question. It was a good point, but I cannot answer it. I hope that the Minister will. I suggest that the Bill be amended to require the sale of these properties and the distribution of the proceeds to all producers. If Milk Marque requires them for future activities, they could be leased back.

I hope that the Minister will listen carefully to what I and my colleagues have to say, because the Bill is flawed. That is why I may oppose it if it stays in its present form. I was quite surprised that it emerged from the other place without major amendment. We have only partly heard what Opposition Members think of it, but I suggest that change is needed. The producers want change, and the wool and dairy industries recognise that change is inevitable. So I am prepared to vote for the Bill on Second Reading if I have the Minister's assurance that these points will be dealt with in Committee. When the Bill returns to the House it must then stand or fall on its merits, and I trust that it will be significantly amended.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): Three themes run through the Bill—themes to which we have become accustomed in the past 14 years. One is the accretion of ministerial power. Another is a preliminary failure to consult. The third is the consequent creation of a monopoly. Legislation on education, health and local government has exhibited a growing concentration of power in Ministers' hands. The idea seems to be that it is easier to confer power on a Minister than to mess about with democratic or statutory bodies. It is also handy because it enables Ministers to evade parliamentary scrutiny by means of delegated legislation. The upshot is that Minister, take decisions that used to be taken by people with more expertise and experience.

The explanatory memorandum tells us that clause 3 and schedule 1 give Ministers powers. Clause 4 enables Ministers, clause 5 enables Ministers, clause 6 empowers Ministers, clause 7 gives Ministers power, clause 9 enables Ministers, clause 13 confers powers on Ministers, clause 16 empowers Ministers, as does clause 20. Clause 22 enables Ministers. Clauses 24 to 27 and schedule 3 set out Ministers' functions. Clause 44 empowers Ministers. The Bill is a perfect illustration of practices that we have got used to, but which have not worked.

My second theme is the failure to consult and I address my comments specifically to the milk industry. While Bristol, East is not well-known as an agricultural constituency, my constituents eat food and drink milk and there is a large dairy, which is a major employer. In particular, there has been a failure to consult interested parties, other than the successor body, about the milk regime. That is a major flaw.

There should have been a specific provision for consultation with all the parties affected. For example, there should have been consultation over reorganisation schemes for the board and before the winding up of the residuary body, and over the conditions under which the development council will operate. Those are all major failures to consult people who have expertise in the industry.

The Government say that they believe in competition, but, so far, their privatisation policies have created only monopolies. What has that to do with a free market, even if it was a good idea? We have seen it with gas, electricity, water and British Telecom. The new body, Milk Marque, is, as I understand the Bill, to be a private co-operative. There is concern in my constituency over how that will operate, because the Government have said that competition legislation will protect milk producers from any abuse by Milk Marque of its dominant position in the market. However, as co-operatives enjoy exemption, particularly on price restrictions, under the Restrictive Trade Practices Acts, it is important to make further legislative provision to prevent abuse. I hope that that matter is addressed in Committee.

Mr. Curry: The milk marketing boards are exempt from the operation of the monopolies and mergers regulations, so the Director General of Fair Trading cannot be referred to. When Milk Marque comes into existence, that immunity will be removed and it will be subject to the full rigour of the Office of Fair Trading and possible reference.

Ms Corston: There is all the difference in the world between a statutory body, for which there is a possibility of parliamentary scrutiny and of input from the general public, and a private, horizontally integrated co-operative, which is what we are talking about.

The Dairy Trade Federation, no less, has expressed concern that Milk Marque proposes to increase the price of milk by 20 per cent., a fact to which the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) referred. On 9 March, the Dairy Trade Federation asked for "independent supervision of this dominant monopoly".

As I read it, there is nothing in the Bill to provide proper transitional arrangements on price, sales, a disputes procedure and continuity of supply, all of which are important. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken already of the dispersal of the milk marketing boards' assets. That should not confer an unfair advantage on, or improperly influence, farmers to join the successor body rather than supply milk direct to a company.

Other hon. Members have already spoken about the important national assets held by the boards and I make no apology for referring to them again. They include, among other things, the national milk record centre, the Genus farm service—that is vital for ensuring a healthy stock and for research into genetics, artificial insemination and other matters—the central testing laboratories, and the milk collection vehicles. The statutory arrangements are the best, but if there is to be a change, it is vital to ensure that there is no discrimination against bodies or companies other than Milk Marque in the use of these national assets. It would be more appropriate if there were a transfer of those functions and services to an independent national body.

It is vital that the flotation of Dairy Crest takes place as soon as possible, because it should be treated by Milk Marque in the same way as any other customer for its milk. That would only be fair to other competitors, if competition is, as it is supposed to be, at the heart of the Bill. There should be either safeguards to ensure effective scrutiny of the milk marketing board-Dairy Crest relationship or a separation of Dairy Crest and Milk Marque.

Mr. Curry: Let me make it clear that Dairy Crest cannot be owned by Milk Marque in the interim period after the end of the scheme, or by the residuary body of the milk marketing boards. Therefore, if Dairy Crest could not be floated in advance, it would be necessary to propose a means to deal with the short-term problem of ownership —perhaps through a trust arrangement. It would not be acceptable for Milk Marque, by accident or design, effectively to control Dairy Crest, even for the transitional period, and alternative arrangements would have to be made.

Ms Corston: Although I am grateful for the Minister's explanation, it would have been helpful if that had been made clear at an earlier stage, rather than only now.

At the heart of the Bill, and anything that the House considers, there should be basic tenet. To quote a former Foreign Secretary, Lord Healey, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." The milk marketing board has worked well and the Government should have fought for it in the way that Governments have supported it and fought for it in the past. European Community legislation did not oblige us to wind it up.

The Labour Members are not the only people opposed to the new regime. I understand that there is concern in Ambridge. Phil Archer has said how worried he is about the winding up of the milk marketing board, which he described as a trusted friend. He spoke about the uncertainty of a new regime and how opposed he was to it.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): What about Eddie Grundy?

Ms Corston: Watch this space.

All producers can sell their milk to, and have confidence in, the milk marketing board. Anything put in its place should provide the same opportunities and give the same confidence. The proposals threaten the livelihood of farmers and those in the dairy industry. There is already a great deal of concentration of power in that industry. Some 79 per cent. of the United Kingdom dairy products market is in the hands of multiple retailers, and four of the largest monopolies have no less than 75 per cent. of that market.

It is vital that we protect the milk industry in the interests of those who work in it, and of the consumers of milk and milk products. Members of Parliament have the primary duty of protecting the interests of our constituents, who are consumers. Other organisations have professional bodies to represent them, but we are here to make sure that whatever we do through legislation on food is in the interests of consumers. Judged by that criterion, the Bill signally fails. That is why the Labour party would be right to vote against it and try to get it amended in Committee.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. As the wind-up speeches will commence at 9.15 pm, I appeal to hon. Members to make relatively brief speeches so that more can be called.

7.59 pm

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to take part in the debate, and I shall heed your request for speeches to be relatively brief.

This is a debate of great interest to my constituents. I have enjoyed listening to the speeches made so far, most notably that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), with which I concur in many respects, not only because of its content but because of the measured way in which my right hon. Friend criticised some aspects of the Bill, striking a more appropriate note than that struck by one or two Opposition Members who attributed the Government policies on the Potato Marketing Board to potato processors' donations to Conservative party funds.

To make such an accusation in the very month that the Duke of Westminster has resigned from the Conservative party because his views were apparently ignored on the Housing and Urban Development Bill, and against a Government who proceeded with their reforms of competition in the brewing industry against the most vociferous complaints of many of the party's principal contributors is extraordinary. If the Conservative party evolves its policies in order to please its contributors, it does so in a way that can only be described as bizarre.

I welcome many of the provisions in the Bill, particularly those relating to group marketing grants. Marketing is important for British agriculture. Improved marketing of our products is essential. We have one of the most efficient agriculture industries in the world, but, compared with the marketing of products from other countries at international food exhibitions, our industry often falls down at the crucial marketing stage. I hope that the group marketing grants will be the spark for many new ideas and projects. They will not revolutionise the industry, but they will begin to show the way and address one of the great weaknesses of our industry.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be able to say a little more about which organisations have expressed interest in those grants so far, what level of interest there has been, what he can do to encourage co-operatives, as well as other ad hoc groups of producers, and how the measures will proceed. The measures are obviously welcome, permitting recovery procedures in the event of the breach of the scheme conditions, enabling grants to relate to the whole of Britain, and so on.

I also give a broad welcome to the provisions relating to the milk marketing boards and the revocation of the milk marketing scheme. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, I think that the milk marketing boards did a good and useful job for a long time, but it is right to revoke the scheme now. If we did not do so, it would probably collapse under its own weight. It is under challenge in the courts, there are all kinds of constraints on Dairy Crest, which do not apply to its competitors, and the pricing and allocation system for milk has clearly failed in Britain during the past 10 years or so, causing consumers to pay a high price for their milk while producers receive a low price when they supply it.

The margins of manufacturers are artificially protected and that has led to an insufficient incentive to go for high value-added products. Often there is not the availability of milk in the United Kingdom to make high value-added products because of the protection of milk for export for lower value-added products.

That particularly came home to me in my constituency where there has been great controversy recently over the future of a dairy in Hawes which Dairy Crest attempted to close. After the valiant and, I am pleased to say, successful efforts of many of my constituents, it has been brought from Diary Crest and is once again churning out true Wensleydale cheese which I hope hon. Members will join me in consuming in the Dining Room at every possible opportunity.

But what really brought home to me the problems in the milk marketing scheme was studying the economics of that dairy and seeing that it was gravely affected by the fact that milk simply was not available on many days of the year for it to produce at all. We have the extraordinary situation where milk is not directed to those customers who value it most. It is not available even to businesses who want to buy it and are prepared to pay for it. That cannot be the right way to run an industry. The result is inefficiency and import penetration of high value-added products. Clearly, this scheme must go.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the problem of supply to processors, to producers of cheese and so on, is not just inefficiency within the milk marketing boards, but the fact that we are allowed to produce only 80 per cent. of the total market. It was the disastrous deal that his right hon. and hon. Friends brought back from Europe in the early 1980s that caused that problem.

Mr. Hague: Milk quotas are a restraint on our national production, but my right hon. and hon. Friends who negotiated that deal had to start from where they were. They could not suddenly demand huge shares of the European market for milk at the expense of other countries already producing it. In fact, what was done in the 1980s now turns out to have provided an important safeguard for small producers. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, I am inevitably concerned that small producers should not be driven out of business but should be given the chance to compete. They are to some extent safeguarded by the existence of milk quotas, even though they were savagely denounced when they were introduced. My right hon. Friend has been vindicated by events.

Like my right hon. Friend, I welcome the creation of Milk Marque. I hope that it is a success and that a high percentage of producers join it. Without being a monopoly, it will have great bargaining power if it succeeds. It will help to ensure that there are fair negotiations, particularly with large supermarket chains. I hope that many farmers will join it. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) because I cannot see why such things as artificial insemination, other breeding services and milk recording services must be part of Milk Marque. That does not necessarily follow.

I hope that Milk Marque will stick to the promise that it made in correspondence sent to me and other hon. Members that it will have milk pricing that is market driven and responsive to supply and demand, and will allow easy access for new businesses, encourage the development of new high value-added products, allow rapid and flexible response to the demands of consumers, meet the challenge of foreign imports and provide export opportunities. If it can do those things, it will be a great success and it will do a great service to British agriculture and the British balance of payments. If it succeeds and makes a voluntary co-operative work, it will set a valuable example to the rest of the industry. I endorse and enthusiastically applaud that part of the Bill.

But that brings me to the other major part of the Bill, concerned with potatoes. Again, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale and my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss), I must sound a cautionary note and say that I am worried about what is proposed. I have yet to be convinced that it is the right course of action.

The milk industry has suffered because of rigid price arrangements, the absence of competition and the existence of a monopoly purchaser, but the same is not true of the potato industry. The Potato Marketing Board is different. There is no monopoly purchaser, there is free competition beyond the farm gate, producers compete with each other making contracts with whomever they want and there are no restrictions on imports so British producers have to be competitive.

Therefore, we should be cautious before we sweep away the system. There is a danger in trying to be neat and deal with all the marketing boards at the same time and in tinkering and interfering too much with arrangements that have worked reasonably well. I share with my hon. Friends a natural bias against marketing boards, quotas and restrictions of any kind, but we must look carefully at how the arrangements work.

What is the case against the Potato Marketing Board? First, we are told that it leads to higher prices: indeed, I have heard many people say that it must do that or producers would not want to be part of it. It is true that prices have tended to be lower in some countries, particularly France and Germany; yet, in many recent years, Dutch prices have been higher than spot prices in the United Kingdom—and, after all, we should compare our prices most rigorously with those of Holland, which seems to be the source of most of the imports.

One of the problems generated by today's debate is the existence of tables of statistics that can prove almost any point that hon. Members wish to illustrate. The potato market is very complicated; there are many different grades of potato, and various places and seasons are involved. The price moves all the time. It is possible to construct a table to demonstrate and validate almost any point—but, for what it is worth, I have a table that shows the spot potato price in the Netherlands to have been higher than the United Kingdom price in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91, and marginally higher, by a few pence per tonne, in 1991-92.

The basic premise that price is at the heart of the matter and that people will pay to be part of the Potato Marketing Board only if they receive a higher price as a result, is not necessarily valid. People pay not just for a higher price, but for a reduction in the risk, regardless of price. The only conclusion that I can draw from the contradictory data that are available is that although the potato market scheme sometimes leads to a higher price in this country, at other times it leads to a lower price. Sometimes the product is scarcer than it would be if the market were completely deregulated, but sometimes supply is made more secure.

After all, producers are liable for a penalty if they do not take up all their quota in any given year: they will lose on their quota allocation in the following year. The potato marketing scheme can act to maintain supply, rather than depressing it in a way that would be characteristic of a damaging monopolistic arrangement. I do not consider the price arguments sufficient justification for sweeping the scheme away.

Another argument used against the scheme is that processing capacity will move abroad. A slight handicap of that argument is the fact that new processing capacity has recently been built in this country. A bigger problem for the industry seems to be the availability of excess processing capacity in Holland, which has led the companies that own that capacity to discount heavily in order to make maximum use of it. Such a development should not be mistaken for a relentless move abroad.

If the scheme's failings have led to more processed imports, why are there more such imports from the Netherlands into many other European countries—countries that have no potato marketing schemes? Perhaps the problem is not so much that processors are moving out of Britain; perhaps it has more to do with inadequate competition among processors in Britain. I feel that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food must conduct and present a much clearer analysis of the industry and its workings—after all, it is a very complex matter—before they can persuade us that the potato marketing scheme needs to be abolished for the reasons they have given.

It is said that the removal of the scheme would result in generally freer and fairer competition, but can we speak of freer competition when Dutch producers seem to be combined into a few large co-operatives with the ability to control plantings and negotiate prices far more effectively than individual, fragmented producers in other countries? Are Ministers sure that this would be the only country in which producers joined to agree on how much should be planted? Are they certain that it would be against our interests to be the only country with such a scheme?

I am very much in favour of free and fair trade, but I am not sure that the outright and rapid abolition of the Potato Marketing Board is the way to achieve it. I think that the other place was sensible to insert one or two provisions in the Bill, and I welcome the Government's announcement that they will not try to reverse those decisions. I also welcome the provisions to ensure the creation of a successor body. I think, however, that there is a strong case for giving the Potato Marketing Board longer to show that it can make things work—that it can work with processors to reduce the percentage of the processed potato market taken by imports, and do more to meet the right specifications with better grading and the like.

I believe that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ministry should pause to reflect before overturning the current arrangements, and I hope that the debate will give them some cause to do so.

8.15 pm

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): My constituency has interests in all three areas covered by the Bill: wool, potatoes—particularly the early potatoes for which it is famous—and, of course, milk and the proposed abolition of the milk marketing boards.

Recently, I have engaged in extensive discussions both with my local branch of the National Farmers Union and with the Farmers Union of Wales. Both organisations—as well as individual farmers—have expressed grave concern. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) pointed out, we have here an organisation which appears not to be broke, so why on earth try to fix it? This is especially relevant to constituencies such as mine, which is 60 miles from the nearest city and has serious transport problems. We have one or two buyers in the milk industry —processors—and the local farmers fear that, if Milk Marque is not a success, they will be under pressure from those processors. They are afraid that prices will be forced down in the local market because Milk Marque has failed nationally.

Having expressed those reservations, I must say that in the main both unions welcome the idea of Milk Marque. They see certain advantages in it. They recognise that Dairy Crest should perhaps have been separated from the milk marketing boards many years ago, and that if that had been done we might not be faced with this Bill now.

The subject of wool was touched on briefly in our debate some weeks ago on hill livestock compensatory allowances. My farmers on the hills of Preseli quoted figures showing that the price that they now receive for their wool is less than half the price that they received 10 years ago. Wool is no longer a reasonable product for them to sell; it is hardly worth shearing the sheep. In the light of that, it is a great shame that the Government have decided to remove the guarantee price: there is now no bottom to the market, and prices are set to plummet.

Many hon. Members have referred to both milk and sheep, but as Pembrokeshire has a special interest in new potatoes, and a special sector of the market I shall speak mostly about the possible abolition of the Potato Marketing Board. Last year, 35,000 tonnes of early potatoes were produced in Pembrokeshire, and that produce alone put a significant amount into our local economy. In 1989, nearly £6 million was pumped into the local economy by sales of early potatoes. In 1990, the figure fell to £4·3 million; in 1991, it went up to £6 million; in 1992, it fell to £3·1 million. It would have fallen much further if the Potato Marketing Board had not intervened and placed a bottom on the market.

The season last year was unusual because the Cypriot, Moroccan and Egyptian early potatoes came in much later and the early English potatoes, because of a mild winter, came in much earlier. The traditional time for the Pembrokeshire potato was extremely limited. Fortunately, the Potato Marketing Board intervened with about £450,000 for Pembrokeshire growers last year. That is a good example of why we need the board to continue to prevent such enormous fluctuations. To illustrate the price ranges, the House might like to know that the average price paid for Pembrokeshire early potatoes in 1989 was £171 per tonne while the average price last year was £95 per tonne.

The Minister told us that he wanted to break the shackles imposed on producers by the Potato Marketing Board. However, in my discussions with growers and with the NFU, no one has said that they want to see the end of the board or that they want to break free of its shackles. To illustrate that point, I want to quote from a letter—not from a sado-masochist, but from John Davies of Herbrandston Hall, a member of the NFU potato committee and one of the largest early potato producers in Pembrokeshire. He writes:

"If quotas were removed the bulk of growers in Wales would stop growing. This would be because without stability we would have years of shortage and high prices followed by large surpluses. In those years because of the carryover of the main crop from the previous year potatoes in Pembrokeshire would not be sold at all. Rather than cope with this they would leave potato growing and reduce their overheads and fixed costs.

There was no early potato industry in Pembrokeshire before the formation of the Potato Marketing Board. Pembrokeshire is the largest supplier of early potatoes in the UK market during May and the first half of June. If the area was substantially reduced it would not be so easy to influence the market and marketing would be very much less effective. The effect of this happening would be an increase in imports of first early potatoes. The home growers have reduced imports from 385,000 tonnes in 1978 to 264,000 tonnes in 1992. This is one of our great successes in import substitution."

That is a good illustration of how, as a result of the Potato Marketing Board and a regime, we have been able to stop imports or to reduce them significantly.

Mr. Davies also referred to the importance of the potato industry to the local economy in respect of the provision of casual and permanent labour. He wrote:

"Potato growers in Wales spend approximately £1·2 million on seasonal labour which is very important to rural economies. About 350 potato growers employ regular farm workers. If they stopped growing potatoes and returned to cereal production they would no longer need this labour."

It is clear that the Government have completely failed to make the case for the abolition of the Potato Marketing Board. I have yet to hear a speech from the Opposition Benches or from the Conservative Benches in favour of its abolition. I certainly did not hear such a speech from the Minister. He seemed confused as to whether it was a good British idea to get rid of the Potato Marketing Board or a bad European one. We have already heard that the Spanish and French operate intervention policies. Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber accept that with the removal of the 50,000 tonnes Government limit, leaving the Potato Marketing Board to intervene to the tune of 450,000 tonnes maximum a year, we would have a totally self-financing scheme which would cost the taxpayer nothing.

Why are the Government proposing to legislate away the Potato Marketing Board? The only answer I can think of is that, unfortunately, they seem determined to get rid of any whiff of an organised market which has worked so very well. They are now virtually in the pockets of the only people who will benefit from the board's abolition—the major potato processors.

It is a great shame that the Government have ignored the success of the Potato Marketing Board. I hope that they will listen to the contributions that have been made in the debate, particularly those from Conservative Back Benchers.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): We are in some considerable danger of under-estimating farmers in this debate. The Bill is important, and it offers a great opportunity for farmers and manufacturers to look forward to a more successful future.

There is no doubt that the attitude of most British farmers is changing. They realise that they must move closer to the marketplace and, to do that, they must adapt their businesses. It is perfectly understandable that most people find it difficult to come to grips with change. There is nothing more alarming than change. People fear change itself, rather than what it may bring. However, farmers are business men and many of them take a great pride in being not only good husbandry men, but also good business men.

As David Naish, the president of the National Farmers Union said at this year's annual general meeting:

"We must face up to change and make it work for us."

That is a realistic approach and I applaud David Naish for it.

I believe that Government intervention in markets, in agriculture or elsewhere, leads to the most almighty muddle. It usually results in trouble. Unmolested markets, certainly in agriculture, are by far the most dynamic, as we can see from the pig and poultry industries. The only way in which the Government should interfere in any of those markets or businesses is to ensure fair play. Let us return to a level playing field.

For as long as I can remember, farmers have always mistrusted supermarkets and end use sellers. Just this morning, I had a conversation with a dairy farmer in my constituency. He told me a story about a large-scale strawberry producer who, when there was a glut, picked strawberries to send to a supermarket. The supermarket scrutineers went to the farm and said, "We are very sorry, but we can't take your produce because you have one too few portable loos in this field for the number of strawberry pickers that you have here."

Supermarkets and large-scale end users are very anxious to build bridges with farmers. They have an important selling job to perform. However, I believe that farmers are beginning to realise that the future looks much better with a joint venture with a large retailer, and that a spirit of co-operation and trust between the two parties is essential if they are to go forward together.

Those of us who have already been approached by end users will be aware that Nestlé already buys milk all over Europe direct from farmers, and that Unigate buys milk direct from farmers in Ireland. That has been achieved with very little difficulty, and the farmers are extremely enthusiastic about that regime.

It is early days to talk about how appalling the situation will be if these boards are swept away. There are stepping stones that show the way, in which the spirit of co-operation between farmer and end user or retailer is developing. On a previous occasion, I mentioned the Strathclyde food initiative. This is an arrangement between Safeways, which is a very large retail group, together with Allied Lyons, Rank Hovis, Unigate and other big operators in the market. If the group finds a farmer who is producing something that it thinks would be of interest to its customers, it approaches him.

Let us suppose that we are talking about someone in Cornwall producing 30 wind-dried hams a week. The farmer is told that the group will send in its experts to show him how to expand his business so that he can produce, say 300 hams a week. He is told that he will be helped to secure larger premises, and that he will be given a five-year contract under which all the wind-dried hams that he can produce will be bought. I use wind-dried hams as an example, although judging from your expression, Mr. Deputy Speaker, they sound delicious to you. That is why retailers are interested in trying to produce more of them.

Obviously there is a way forward for people who are able to develop businesses in this way. As we have seen today, interest rates are coming down. This too gives farmers an opportunity to develop their own marketing enterprises and secure a place alongside the big retailers.

I am extremely pleased that the interest rate under the loan guarantee scheme for small businesses has been dropped by two percentage points and that farmers who came forward with marketing schemes are eligible, as they are eligible for group marketing grants. I am glad that my right hon. Friend is setting up a review to make the scheme more flexible and to ensure that the rules under which it operates are a great deal more straightforward.

In the Ministry of Agriculture, there is a tremendous move afoot to slash red tape. I am very pleased about that, as we hear daily about how much difficulty there is. There is the annual sheep premium. There is the change in the date for claiming headage payments, and support for suckler herds is becoming more and more arduous. Farmers are expected to do more to claim grants, and I understand that in some markets, to cover the cost of veterinary inspection in slaughterhouses, a surcharge is being imposed on farmers who sell their produce in those markets.

That is not right, and I hope that this drive to sweep away regulation and make the farmer's lot a little easier will be continued with gusto. Change is rolling forward. More and more farmers are realising that their best future depends on the changes proposed in the Bill. Opportunities are to be found in a freer market, as David Naish says.

I turn now to milk marketing. In the past few weeks, hon. Members who are interested in this subject and in other agricultural matters, have been approached by the milk marketing boards, or Milk Marque—my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) has spoken with some passion about this matter—and we have been approached by Nestlé and Unigate. Every meeting has been interesting and has helped us to understand some of the opportunities that lie ahead for the farmers. Milk Marque has spoken with great confidence about the future and about its hope of persuading many farmers to stay with it.

It is quite right that many of them should gain more confidence by doing just that. The milk marketing organisation has behind it 60 years of history and of service to the farmer. However, we are concerned not about the last 60 years but about the next 60. The milk marketing boards have a fine reputation and a large following of dedicated farmers, but they must be careful not to sully their reputation by trying to persuade farmers to jump into trading with them, come what may. Historically, they have been rather wooden in their efforts to increase farmers' returns.

There is no doubt that Dairy Crest has been favoured with surplus milk. Dairy Crest deals only in low-value products—milk powder and butter. At least, that is one of its main interests. This is what has been done with the surplus milk. It is the cheapest means of getting rid of it. But, as the milk marketing boards have said in the past, "Milk is milk, and if you want to buy from us you will have to take what we give you." In no way have the boards been willing to tailor milk to what the end user requires. The days of milk being just milk are coming to an end. Much more attention must be paid to the opportunities to increase the returns to the farmer.

I was rather shocked by something that my farmer friend said to me on the telephone this morning. He said that the milk marketing board is currently paying him 21p a litre but that it proposes, from April next year, to pay 27p a litre. I should like to know why this man, who is never slow to express his opinions to me, did not chase the board to give him 27p a litre now. What is going to change between now and next April, apart from the fact that the board will have to face up to the real world?

As other hon. Members have said, there is a feeling that the milk marketing boards are giving an uncompetitive edge to Milk Marque, as they are picking up the cost of promoting it. We have heard about the transport fleet, the property currently owned by the boards, including the large office in Thames Ditton and many depots throughout the country, and I understand that they own three large farms. How will those who do not opt in to Milk Marque share in these assets, to which they have contributed?

There are the questions of Genus, central testing and national milk recording. My farmer friend, who is going to join Milk Marque, says that the visits made by the national milk recording staff do not matter—lots of people visit his farm—but the visits of the milk recorders are very intimate matters. A recorder knows precisely what a farmer's cows are producing and how his costings are arranged, and that will give Milk Marque an unfair advantage. As other hon. Members have said, the assets should be separated from Milk Marque, and all those who are to share in the flotation of Dairy Crest should share in them.

Another matter that has come to my attention has rather alarmed me. A circular that the milk marketing organisation has sent to some of its existing buyers says:

"1. We may not be able to supply you with any milk at all if you have declined to submit an intention to purchase form.

2. Your priority return may be scaled down or ignored if it appears not to be a bona fide estimate of your own business needs.

3. We will regard it as part of our responsibility to establish a fair rationing system amongst our customers if there should prove to be a shortage of milk."

If that is not an attempt to put the elbow on some users and on some farmers by saying that they will have a share in the assets to which I have referred, I should like to know what would be. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister, in summing up, will be able to say something about this matter.

I am sure that Milk Marque, whatever form it takes, will be successful. If it captures, say, 88 per cent. of the market, who will regulate the market? My right hon. Friend spoke of his distaste for the concept of Ofmilk but said that his mind was still open. Some comment on this question in the summing-up speech would be very helpful. We should like to hear exactly what my right hon. Friend's thoughts are now.

I should like to refer to some other points that were put to my hon. Friends and myself at our meetings with the processors. They all feel that there are great opportunities ahead for producers, and, of course, for themselves, to promote British food. The manufacturers want to trade direct with farmers, and will be able to pay them a premium if they tailor the milk they produce to what is needed for the manufacturing process.

We know that there are creameries and manufacturing establishments in isolated areas throughout the country —for example, in St. Erth and Haverfordwest, where Unigate has large manufacturing plants. If these plants are to have a successful future in difficult circumstances, and if the farmers are to have a premium, persuading them to deal direct and produce tailor-made milk will reduce the costs of the manufacturer and enhance the returns.

People talk also about the possibility of imported milk. At the moment, the only liquid milk imported into this country is treated milk and, as I understand it, the cost of moving liquid milk is very high or, at least, is a large proportion of the cost of what is a fairly low value product. That is not on. Many other fears that are being expressed by the farmers about manufacturers going abroad to buy liquid milk are, I believe, ill founded, because I really do not believe they will.

Northern Milk Partnership is another company with which we have been having discussions. It has issued thousands of prospectuses, it tells us, of details that it will send out for its contracts, and good luck to it.

The milk manufacturers have told hon. Members that, it they can achieve a satisfactory transition, the United Kingdom consumer can look forward to greater price stability, and even wider range of innovative and good-quality, added-value products, made here in the United Kingdom and, I hope, an end to having to depend on the French so much to send in the more exciting and unusual milk products that we have been consuming in this country.

I turn to the potato board for a moment, although I do not have many potato growers in my constituency. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) read out a letter from a potato grower in his constituency. May I read out part of a letter I received from the secretary of the Potato Growers Action Group? He says:

"Large numbers of farmers now oppose the PMB since it lost import controls in 1979. From that date, its main aim of matching supply to demand became obsolete. By imposing restrictive quotas on UK growers, all it has done is create a gap for imports to fill."

This gap has been filled at the end of the food chain by imported foreign processed potatoes. This is especially disappointing as processed potatoes is where the major growth is in the potato market, and importing processed potatoes denies manufacturers in this country the opportunity of creating work for our own citizens.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The hon. Gentleman has mentioned an action group. Will he accept that a letter was recently published in the farming press from an organisation of that name? It was immediately denounced in following editions of the paper by a great many individual potato producers, who made it clear, as has the National Farmers Union, that the majority of potato processors support the PMB and feel that it has done a very good job for the producers. Does he accept that it is a minority view that he is putting to the House?

Mr. Marland: No, it is not a minority view. We have had discussions with potato producers, and a number of them are very sceptical of the benefits of the potato board. They are not such a small number.

To carry on with the letter:

"The Board contradicts itself in claiming low prices to consumers and high prices to growers, depending upon whom it is speaking to at the time. In fact, the weather has a greater effect on price than the Board."

To be quite honest, not one potato grower has contacted me to say that he is anxious to see the continuation of the potato marketing board.

The Bill heralds a new era of opportunity for farmers, manufacturers and consumers and will, I hope, ensure that more high-quality, added-value products are made in Britain, to be eaten in Britain and exported to Europe and to the rest of the world.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): We have heard a number of interesting contributions tonight. I must tell the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), with whom I share space on the Select Committee on Agriculture, that his was the first voice tonight in favour of the abolition of the Potato Marketing Board. The vast majority of hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have supported its retention, at least for a period. His was a minority view.

What has united both sides of the House is the tributes paid to the milk marketing board and its work over the 60 years of its existence. During that time, it has served the milk sector extremely well. We should not forget the circumstances which lead to its creation as a statutory body in the 1930s. At that time, many farmers faced a crisis of monumental proportions. Bankruptcies were commonplace, and small farmers were at the mercy of the free market. Many were driven to the wall.

It is not surprising, therefore, against that background, that many in the industry view the demise of the board as a statutory body with considerable dismay. It has served milk producers very well. The monthly pay cheque, guaranteed, with regular collection throughout the year, irrespective of location, has been an anchor of certainty in an industry which has seen its fair share of turbulence in recent years.

However, it has been clear for some time that the dairy sector itself is going through a period of profound change and the uncertainty which that inevitably involves. The main changes have been happening in the marketplace. As was said in another place on Second Reading:

"The days are long since gone when British milk was consumed almost exclusively as butter, cheddar cheese and silver top milk."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 November 1992, Vol. 540, c. 798.]

The dairy market has seen enormous changes in consumer demand and preferences. We now eat considerably more yoghurt and a large range of other products—for example, soft cheeses, which are now consumed in vast quantities—and over 40 per cent. of drinking milk in England and Wales is purchased in skimmed or semi-skimmed form. We have even seen a sharp decline in the doorstep delivery of milk.

Since a question mark exists over the MMB's exclusive purchasing right of low fat milk, there is no doubt that the board as currently constituted stands at a crossroads. Should the board's powers be amended to take into account these changes in consumer demand or should the statutory powers be abolished? Many producers will feel worried by the approach that has been adopted by the Government but, given that they have adopted this approach, we need to consider the impact of the changes.

Many small producers, in particular, will welcome the proposal to establish a voluntary co-operative for England and Wales—it gives them relative security in the short term. However, they will need assurances on a continuing commitment to collection and regular payment, wherever their farms are located. Farmers located in isolated rural areas, such as those that I represent, will feel vulnerable and will fear that their collection costs will increase over time. This could lead to an increasing concentration of milk production on the fringes of urban areas where collection and delivery costs are much lower. We need some assurances on this matter.

In recent years, when farmers have asked me for my advice as to whether they should dispose of their milk quota, I have told them that on no account should they do so, since it gives them a regular cheque and provides them with certainty in a market which is changing rapidly. However, those who will maintain milk production in isolated rural areas need assurances about the new regime.

One of the most telling arguments in favour of a powerful voluntary co-op is the strength of the multiple retailers. It is a fact that 79 per cent. of the United Kingdom market for dairy products is in the hands of the multiple retailers, and that four of the largest multiples command no less than 75 per cent. of the market. Farmers, therefore, operating through co-ops, have considerable strength to negotiate with retailers; standing outside a co-operative, they face the danger of being picked off one by one.

We must not forget the position of small producer co-operatives; their interests also need to be protected. Many have complained that they have had difficulty in obtaining sufficient milk and that, under new arrangements, they must be given opportunities to secure sufficient quantities of milk for their plants. Many play a valuable role in maintaining the economy of rural areas and provide much needed jobs in those areas. We would welcome an assurance from the Minister which built on his intervention to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams).

It is important that Milk Marque, or whichever successor body is set up, does not administer the quota system. It should be transferred to an independent body, which would also maintain an important statistical database. That would ensure the maintenance of commercial confidentiality.

Research and development are regarded as important by the farming industry. The idea of a development council is a good one. Proper research and development are vital for any industry, especially the milk industry, which faces great challenges. Can the Government give an assurance about their commitment to the continuation of research and development and ensure, if necessary, that sufficient funding is given to that end? The lack of proper research and development is hampering much of the industry in the United Kingdom today.

On potato marketing, hon. Members from both sides of the House have said that it is extremely premature for the Government to call for the demise of the potato marketing scheme. Farming unions, as well as potato producers, oppose the Government's decision to revoke the scheme. A former Minister of Agriculture, the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) said that, since 1989, the potato marketing scheme has adapted to changing conditions and that targeted areas for potatoes have been expanded specifically to accommodate growth sectors in industry. Many growers have invested heavily in potato storage following the Government's review in 1989, and they would be let down badly by an early end to the scheme.

I regret the Government's decision to terminate the existing guarantees for wool. A sudden ending of the wool guarantee this year will have a damaging effect on the income of wool producers at a time when world market prices are depressed and sheep farmers face cuts in hill livestock compensatory allowance payments. We should remember that the economy of many areas where there are hill farmers is extremely fragile, and that to withdraw the wool guarantee this year would be a severe mistake. The way in which it will be withdrawn has been deplored by the farming unions. We should at least have proper parliamentary scrutiny of the decision. We believe that the wool guarantee should be retained at least for the time being, to enable the industry to stabilise.

I have highlighted several matters of great concern to hon. Members who represent farmers in Wales. I hope that the Government will take those matters on board.

8.52 pm

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me at a time in the debate when the Front Bench is full. I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for obtaining the information which I requested earlier. I understand that, for clause 53(4), we should read 54(4).

I do not underestimate the Government's difficulties in these considerations. It is always much easier to take an industry into state control than to liberate it from the shackles of such control. Essentially, this Bill is about liberating the food and farming industry from certain aspects which could, broadly speaking, be termed state control. The Minister must be pleased that the Bill is generally, if not always enthusiastically, welcomed.

Mr. Home Robertson: Who by?

Mr. Christopher Gill: If the hon. Gentleman wants to make interventions from a sedentary position, I will do my best to deal with them if he speaks up, but it would be much easier if he made them in a more formal way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No hon. Member should be making sedentary interventions.

Mr. Home Robertson: Perhaps the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) can tell me exactly who on earth welcomes the provisions of the Bill?

Mr. Gill: Many hon. Members have welcomed many aspects of the Bill, and I stand before the House doing exactly that. However, I point out to the Minister that many safeguards will be sought and, especially in the case of the milk and dairy industries, must be given. I hope that the safeguards and assurances that the industry seek will be forthcoming. I am confident that my right hon. Friend the Minister recognises that failure to accommodate the major concerns of the industry will lead to investment plans being delayed, cancelled or even taken abroad.

I recognise the dilemma that my right hon. Friend the Minister faces in trying to reconcile his free market views and instincts within the straightjacket of the managed market imposed by the common agricultural policy. That is nowhere more apparent than in the dairy sector, where a structural deficit of milk in the United Kingdom will tend to inhibit entrepreneurial activity and import substitution. My right hon. Friend reminded the House that the United Kingdom must put its milk to the best use, and he instanced how the Bill would liberate the creative potential of our industry to do just that.

In the context of the views and opinions of people who add value to the product—the processors—I want to make a few further comments. My right hon. Friend said that we must not be left with the commodity end of the business. Obviously, we must concentrate on adding value wherever we can. The concern of the processing industry is well expressed by the Food and Drink Federation, which makes the point that milk and dairy products are major and essential ingredients for food and drink manufacture and that the availability of supplies and the price of milk and dairy products are central to the ability of manufacturers to meet consumer demands.

Manufacturers are seeking a marketing system which ensures regular availability of high quality supplies and which is as open, competitive, efficient and genuinely market based as possible, given the constraints of the European Community milk quota system. They are highly concerned, however, that if the Bill's provisions are introduced in their present form a free market for milk will not be the end result. Manufacturers seek assurances that the terms of transfer of the assets of the milk marketing boards will not be such as to press milk producers unduly to join only successor bodies to the milk marketing boards.

Manufacturers with plant in Scotland and Northern Ireland are concerned that if, as is currently envisaged, the milk marketing boards in those regions are permitted to retain their processor capacity, users will face unfair competition. They also seek assurances that the reorganisation in milk marketing will ensure the development of competition in the market, and about how that will be supervised. The Bill will have failed manufacturers and consumers if it results in a statutory monopoly to market milk being replaced with an uncontrolled voluntary monopoly. Lastly, manufacturers want the Bill to provide full consultation for all interested parties on details of successor schemes. Of course, that theme has been repeated in other speeches today.

I support the amendments introduced in another place in relation to potatoes. In common with other right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken today, I welcome the assurance by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture that he will not seek to reverse those amendments.

In my experience, the potato industry has difficulty in accepting the end of the potato quota at a time when the quota system has been extended into other sectors of agriculture. I query the premise that the price of potatoes will not fluctuate widely in a totally free market. I draw the attention of the House to what happens in another totally free and unsubsidised sector of the food and farming industry. Twelve months ago the price of pigmeat was about 128p per kilo, whereas eight months previously it has been about 79p per kilo. In an eight-month period, there was a massive fluctuation of about 62 per cent. in the price of that raw material. I repeat that that was in a market which is totally unsubsidised, free and subject to market forces.

Mr. Curry: None the less, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has heard any pig producers asking for a heavy intervention regime in pigmeat. They appear to think that that system, with all its fluctuations, is still the best.

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend is right. Those who are associated with the pig industry on either side of the farm gate take that view. They support the concept of earning a living by the market, they accept the workings of the market and market forces, but it is difficult to run an industry in which the raw material has such volatility. In my experience, it means that when the producer is making money, the processor is probably losing money. Conversely, when the producer is losing money, the processor is probably making money.

For a long time, I have believed that, for many agricultural products, there is only one profit in the whole production and processing cycle. I was pleased to hear that view supported by Sir Alistair Grant, the chairman of Safeway, speaking on the farming programme this morning. I am led to the conclusion that I should support the opinion of potato growers in the Ludlow constituency, as endorsed by the National Farmers Union nationally, that the potato marketing scheme should not be summarily dismissed and that, under the principle of subsidiarity, the Government should support the concept of allowing the British potato industry to work out its own salvation over a reasonable period.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister please investigate the system of area and plant royalty levies, which threatens to put seed potato producers such as Shropshire Highland Seeds in my constituency out of business when a free market in potatoes is created?

Another aspect of the Bill is grants for marketing. A curious belief still persists that there is a continuing willingness on the part of the taxpayer to fund such operations. I express some disappointment at the apparent lack of faith in market solutions to essentially market problems. I remind my right hon. and hon. Friends of the old maxim that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. I ask them to consider the effect of earlier grant schemes, particularly on the production side of our industry, which led to serious structural surpluses and over-capacity, all at a huge cost to the taxpayer. As often as not, that has been to the benefit of big businesses rather than, as perhaps was intended, to the benefit of small farmers and small businesses.

I recognise that the Bill is an enabling Bill, and I am, of course, conscious of a previous enabling Bill. I refer to the Food Safety Bill, which I supported with enthusiasm. I remember saying at the time that it contained nothing to which a bona fide food handler could possibly take exception. Had anyone told me that, as a result of the plethora of regulations it triggered, farmers' wives in my constituency wishing to provide bed-and-breakfast accommodation would have to have their kitchens completely revamped, I might have taken a contrary view.

I draw the attention of the House to clause 54 of the Bill, which says:

"An order or regulations under this Act may include such supplementary, incidental, consequential or transitional provisions as appear to the person making it to be necessary or expedient".

I remind Ministers that we are committed as a Government to deregulation and that this industry and other industries—one might say the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker—are fed up with too many rules and regulations. The Government simply have to get off the backs of the wealth creators or risk killing the goose that lays the golden eggs.

9.5 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I intervene in this debate simply because it is intended to extend this Bill by prayable order to Northern Ireland and that is not something that either I or anyone else on this Bench ever welcome.

We should not allow the somewhat bland language of the Bill to conceal the fact that in it we are transferring from this House to Europe a very large authority—and one of the final chunks—that we have remaining over agriculture in this country. That has not so far been mentioned in the debate.

If we are to end these sytems which have served agriculture so well, they should be replaced only by a system which keeps the strengths given to the primary producer by the present schemes.

I expect to hear calls from the processors. They are protesting loudly about vertical integration but I do not hear similar protests about vertical integration when the beneficiaries are the retailers or those who process in that vertical integration. The protests arise because the intention seems to be that this would be a primary producer controlled vertical integration and I, as an ex-farmer, applaud that.

I find it amazing that, when the Minister was introducing the Bill today he was busily talking about abolishing quotas on potatoes but said not a word about abolishing milk quotas or quotas or other goods. He said that we would get rid of quotas on potatoes but keep them on other goods. Why is there this divided opinion on the Government Bench? There must be some reason for it. Perhaps we could have an explanation.

There is no point in talking about a competitive situation in milk and complaining about problems of supply when the shortages of supply about which there are complaints simply arise from the quotas on production of milk in this country. If one wants a really competitive supply, one has to get rid of quotas, and that is mighty difficult to do. That is the reality of the situation that no one here wants to face.

There is real concern about the powers being given to Ministers over any successor organisations. That concern is widespread in the agriculture community.

A number of hon. Members opposite also seem to have forgotten that we have a land frontier in this nation, and it is a land frontier across which raw milk has flowed in considerable quantities over the past few years. That concerns many people in Northern Ireland because we are concerned about how the Northern Ireland milk processing industry will develop and whether any of it will move into the hands of a foreign state which would use it to the benefit of their farmers, so that we would be exporting jobs along with the milk processing.

We are entering a free market situation. Milk is one of the foundation stones of Ulster agriculture and we wish to protect it because it is vital to the whole farming community there. We want a system which is co-operative, firmly based on Northern Ireland producers and controlled by them because they will have the wit to look after their own welfare rather than leaving it in the hands of processors when processing can be sold, right, left and centre to anyone in the world who will use it purely for their own benefit without any concern for the agricultural community.

I understand that the milk marketing board in Northern Ireland wants to effect the change as soon as possible. There is a time scale problem here, because even if the Bill gets Royal assent by July, the Northern Ireland order may not come until the autumn. That will mean that we are at least three months behind and it will be almost impossible to make the conversion date of 1 April next year. I understand that there were problems with the Scottish milk marketing board, with the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and the Office of Fair Trading; I ask the Northern Ireland Minister, who is present on the Front Bench, to remember that there is a great difference in the way in which the milk is split up and handled in the Province.

As for potatoes, I know a fair bit about them because for many years we grew the basic seed propagation for the whole of Northern Ireland on our farm, and I have probably seen more varieties of potatoes than most hon. Members—the reality is that they are a high-cost crop with very variable costs.

There is the problem in Northern Ireland that the potatoes which we grow are very often seed potatoes. They are seed varieties which are of no use in Northern Ireland because they are not grown to produce ware in the British climate; they are grown to produce a ware crop in a continental or north African climate. The Minister is well aware of that. Therefore, we find ourselves this year with a huge number of seed potatoes, while the market has collapsed completely from a sale of £18 million to £9 million. They are potatoes which nobody wants; they are totally useless.

We are also caught by the fact that, although we produce very high quality seed, this year's ware is a very high yield. The seed has not gone, but is sitting there. I know of one farmer in my constituency who has 4,000 tonnes in stock; it is perfectly good seed, but nobody wants it. There is such a huge variation in the price of varieties in Northern Ireland that a stock scheme simply cannot be triggered. There are potatoes in Northern Ireland which are selling at a perfectly good price. The English growers have the salvation of a £35 differential for shipping across the Channel from the continent. We have the problem of shipping them over here and we need some sort of a stockfeed scheme very rapidly indeed.

I know that the Minister has been given all the figures and is aware of the problem. I hope that he will make some effort to help seed potato growers in Northern Ireland, because that is a trade which will come back. Those people who buy our seed potatoes have disease problems after a year or so and have to come back to the northern producers to get healthy stock. They will be back, and I do not want them to come back and find nothing there.

I do not think that the Government have been very helpful to the Northern Ireland producers this year. I understand that 2,000 tonnes of seed potatoes were sent out by the Overseas Development Agency—a Government agency—to Bosnia. They did not go to tender for these, and the price was £140 per tonne. Apparently they all came from one source in Scotland—a perfectly good source I have no doubt, but if they had gone to Northern Ireland they could have had 2,000 tonnes in two days for a lot less than £140 a tonne. I understand that the producers in Scotland got £70 a tonne, so somebody was making a lot of money out of Bosnia. The Government have not handled that one very well and we are most unhappy about it, but we hope that they will do somewhat better in the future.

There is much more that not only I but other hon. Members would like to have said in this debate, but time has run out. I have tried to touch very briefly on the concerns we have, and I hope that we shall get satisfactory answers before the day is done.

9.13 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I realise that I am up against the clock and I will make my intervention extremely brief so that the wind-up speeches can start on time.

I share the opinion of other Conservative Members about what will happen to the residue of the milk marketing boards, in particular testing, national data recording and Genus. I agree that it would be wrong to pass those over to Milk Marque.

I have a solution that I can offer briefly to my right hon. Friend about what he should do, particularly with regard to national milk recording. If it is freed from the milk marketing boards, it will be able to sit very well in the new animal data centre which the National Centre for Animal Statistics wants to set up for the livestock industry. The NCAS is based in my constituency and the new centre will be well worth supporting. The danger is that if we go ahead without moving the milk records away from Milk Marque, the records will be scattered all over the place. It is vital for the livestock industry in Britain that those records are kept together.

I believe that, under a development council, the animal data centre could provide the livestock industry with an extremely valuable database and be of immeasurable value to future generations, and I urge my right hon. Friend to consider that when he sorts out the final details of the milk marketing boards.

9.16 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): We have had an interesting debate, including a chirpy little speech from the Minister which I am sure the burghers of Peckham will well enjoy.

It has been a delayed debate because the Bill has been a casualty of Maastricht. Last week's Farming News went as far as suggesting that the Government were pulling the Bill out—no such luck. The overwhelming view of the House tonight has been that the marketing boards—in particular the milk marketing boards—have served the country well.

Lest we forget the measure of stability that the milk marketing board has brought to British agriculture, we need do no more than read Hansard debates of the early 1930s prior to the original scheme being set up. The horror stories of milk production difficulties in the 1920s and early 1930s are legion in the industry and those days must never be allowed to return.

The milk marketing boards' cheque has saved the British dairy industry: that point was put eloquently by the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling).

One of the biggest threats to the boards was in 1978. I pay tribute to the shadow Minister of Agriculture, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) who, with the late John Silkin, successfully secured concessions enabling the milk marketing board to survive. I know that the entire British dairy industry is grateful to my hon. Friend.

Marketing boards in the United Kingdom have been enormously successful, not least the Potato Marketing Board which was alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). Despite occasional difficulties, it has been an important component in market stability over a large number of years; a tightly policed target area, combined with intervention arrangements—the existence of a non-tariff barrier, in the form of a £32-plus channel crossing charge on imports, to which the Minister referred—have produced a relatively stable potato sector.

The problem is that the processors are not getting what they need at the right price and we acknowledge the difficulty. A way round that dilemma has to be found, as the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) said. However, I am not convinced that the Government's proposals for a totally free market provide the answer. The official Opposition cannot sit on their hands and watch a part of the British potato industry driven into bankruptcy on the altar of Government ideology. We will therefore go into Committee primed to respond to, or to initiate, any compromise suggestion that secures the survival of the board, perhaps under a revised scheme.

It is a pity that the industry—that, is the producers and the processors—has not been able to draw up a revised scheme that the Minister could sell to the Community. However, we must avoid at all costs a scheme based on intervention which costs the taxpayer money. I know that that has been discussed by the industry in recent weeks, but I make it absolutely clear that it is not on Labour's agenda and I understand that it is not on the Government's.

The sight of potato mountains being destroyed in France and, to some extent, in Northern Ireland may invite calls for public subsidy, and there is evidence to suggest that that is precisely what is happening in Europe, but that is not the answer. Where quotas avoid state intervention and public subsidy we should never be too hasty to remove them, which is why we see some merit in the revision of the scheme, rather than its abolition.

The official Opposition are deeply concerned about the Government's proposals for wool—a matter which the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) alluded to in an interesting contribution. We are acutely conscious of the problems faced by Britain's sheep farmers. As I said during the most recent debate on hill livestock compensatory allowance payments, we believe that, to some extent, that problem can be dealt with in the marketplace, with an assault by Britain's lamb producers on the European sheep markets where prices are substantially higher. Nevertheless, until higher lamb prices are available to farmers, we strongly believe in the principle of a wool scheme that supplements low incomes in much of the sheep sector.

On milk and the Government's proposals for reorganisation, we believe that the milk marketing boards could have survived and would have done so under a Labour Government. We recognise that a number of difficulties have arisen, all of which have been alluded to during the debate. A series of challenges to the boards' powers have effectively undermined its strategic position in the marketplace.

The activities of Botfari, the Cheshire company acting as a contract processor, having eaten into the board's powers as a monopoly purchaser. Equally, the heat-treated and low-fat milk cases, while being pursued with various degrees of success and failure, served to challenge the role of the milk marketing board as exclusive purchaser in the market place. We are, therefore, faced with the need to address a reality—a real change in circumstances—and it is in that light, and with that in mind, that the official Opposition will play a highly constructive role during the debate in Committee.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): Can the hon. Member enlighten me that I am hearing correctly? From what he is saying, the Government had no choice but to introduce the Agriculture Bill.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have not said that—indeed, we shall oppose the Bill. I have suggested that we could have retained the milk marketing board but amended its powers. In Committee we shall argue that case.

We want a strong Milk Marque and a level playing field for processors to organise contracts with producers. We have set ourselves a number of objectives for the Committee stage, all of which are founded on the need to retain an orderly market in the supply of milk. We are acutely aware of the need for legislation to be framed in such a way as to balance carefully the interests of direct contract processors and of Milk Marque, acting as a broker. In that light, we shall wish to ensure that the successor organisation to the milk marketing board is not able to manipulate the market through the abuse of its market share or through the restricted availability of any of its retained assets.

The legislation, if properly framed at the enabling stage and in any subsequent orders, should relieve the Dairy Trade Federation or its members of the need to go to the Office of Fair Trading or to the competition authorities in the European Community.

One measure of the success of the Bill will be whether it can be implemented without driving the processors into appeal procedures on reorganisation of the market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) emphasised the concerns of processors in her constituency about that issue. We shall want to ensure that the Bill provides for the widest possible consultation with producers and processors of milk prior to any reorganisation schemes being approved by Ministers. We are tabling a number of amendments to deal with that process.

We believe that the Dairy Trade Federation has argued fairly for a number of co-operatives to be established under alternative arrangements. It may well be that, as the market develops, a number of new co-operatives will be formed. The question is whether, at the legislative stage, Ministers should have those other arrangements in mind when deciding whether or not to approve the board's proposals.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-East): I am sorry to disturb my hon. Friend in full flow, but is not one problem for producers, particularly in less-favoured areas such as mine, that they could be picked off by a buyer other than the milk marketing board's successor? Those producers would then be forced out of business because their milk could not be cross-subsidised by the milk marketing board's successor.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend raises an important issue, with which I shall deal later.

Some people argue that for Milk Marque to be strong in the marketplace it does not necessarily need 80 per cent. of the milk suppliers. We shall no doubt debate such matters at length in Committee.

The hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) raised the issue of consumer interests. Before Second Reading, the debate has been characterised by far too little consideration of that vital interest. Apart from comments by the National Consumer Council, there has been almost no discussion in the industry on those subjects. The result has been that a number of developments are proposed which, combined with devaluation of the green pound, have major implications for the processing industry in the United Kingdom.

The formidable and confidence-inspiring Mr. Andrew Dare, chief executive of the English and Welsh milk marketing board, is making statements that cause much concern. Two weeks ago he announced on the radio that Milk Marque would be charging more than 27p per litre. In that interview he failed to say that, within the 15-month period between December 1992 and April 1994, the manufacturing milk price—if one takes the Milk Marque proposed supply price and the green pound devaluation into account—will have risen by almost 35 per cent. for butter powdered milk, almost 35 per cent. for Cheddar cheese milk and almost 37 per cent. for short-life products such as yoghurt and cream.

In the processing industry, milk forms 35 per cent. of the production cost for yoghurt, 40 to 45 per cent. for the liquid milk and 75 to 80 per cent. for butter and skimmed milk powder production. It is clear that increases of that magnitude, which will be imposed on processors and passed on to the consumer, will have major implications, not only for jobs in the processing industry, but for the housewife who will pay more.

Devaluation is one thing, but a predatory Milk Marque acting against the public interest is another. Those early attempts to manipulate the price of milk—which the board justified on the basis of guide pricing—and attempts to influence the flow of contracts, point to Milk Marque effectively becoming a voluntary monopoly. That is unacceptable. We want a strong Milk Marque, but not one that means that free and effective arbitration procedures can drive up the price of milk in conditions of deficit milk supply and then undermine employment in the processing industry.

I should like to quote an article in The Grocer of earlier this year. Under the heading,

"Milk price increases take toll on trade",

it says:

"Cheshire cheese manufacturers are turning tankers away in an effort to limit losses resulting from this year's £330 a tonne increase in the milk price. The £100 a tonne extra they received from buyers in January merely compensated for raw material cost rises last autumn".

That was the increase gained from the green pound devaluation.

"John Fishburne, chairman of Crewe-based Hankelow Foods, went on to say, 'Recouping the remainder from competitive retailers is not easy. In order to keep loss-making stocks to a minimum, Hankelow is only taking four tankers a week into its dairy instead of the usual seven'."

So the writing is on the wall; let the market beware.

There has been a price hike, in this case arising out of the devaluation of the green pound. The next price hike arises out of deregulation and the abolition of the milk marketing scheme. A number of processors in the United Kingdom find their viability at risk unless there is a restraining factor in the marketplace—that is why I asked the Minister my question about arbitration in the market.

Although I accept that the single European market, following devaluation, brings new opportunities for British dairy exports, an inflated milk price can only cause harm to domestic markets. It is likely that we will have to find some means of arbitration in the new deregulated market. These are matters for Committee. The response of the processors, despite the DTF's protests, has been muted. It seems that they do not want to upset Milk Marque and the formidable Mr. Dare. Equally, they seem to believe that the consumer, faced with no other choice, will simply bear the price increases.

This is just not good enough. A great deal of concern —to answer the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones)—has been expressed about the position of low volume milk producers and those who run dairy operations away from processing plants in the more remote parts of the United Kingdom. I was particularly struck by some polling data from the south-west of England, where marginality is such an issue that farmers feel that they must support Milk Marque. Mr. Dare's apparent announcement that Milk Marque will remain, in effect, the buyer of last resort, although helpful as a reassurance to the industry, needs fleshing out and reinforcing in Committee, where we shall press these matters.

We shall also press the case for new entrants to the processing industry who, we hope, within the dynamics of the new marketplace, will have access to sensibly priced milk supplies—a point made by the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague).

We accept that innovation is invariably sparked off in conditions of competitive risk, but competition should not snuff out the potential for such innovation. Much debate has taken place on the milk marketing board's assets and there has been a great deal of exaggeration outside the House of the asset value of Dairy Crest and of the size of the cheque that the producers can expect when it is floated.

The Scottish milk marketing board has fought fiercely for vertical integration, and I have much sympathy with its argument—which, in the light of recent rulings, it would appear to have lost. Northern Ireland has similarly argued its corner; no doubt in Committee we shall pursue the cases put by these boards in greater detail. I give the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) that assurance.

There is also, however, the question of the other assets held by the MMB—especially Genus, national milk records and central testing. The instinct of Labour Members favours supporting the retention of many of these assets in the successor body, but that position is not engraved on tablets of stone. We believe that the Committee stage provides some opportunity for further detailed consideration. We hope that the Government, while not having to approve schemes at this stage, will sound out the views of Committee members before taking any decisions.

It would be quite improper of the Government to argue that these matters are for Milk Marque. In our view, those are matters for the Government, in that the wrong decision on approvals could distort the flow of contracts between producers, processors and Milk Marque—a point raised by the hon. Members for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) and for Ludlow (Mr. Gill). They expressed deep concern on those matters, which we shall be following up in Committee.

The Bill is interesting, but it is highly controversial. There are major flaws at its heart. First, it winds up the wool marketing scheme without paying any regard to the problems of sheep farming incomes in the United Kingdom. Amendments to mitigate the damage were moved in the Lords, but they were rejected. We shall try again in the Commons.

Secondly, the Bill abolishes the potato marketing scheme and will drive the United Kingdom's potato producers into a free market. The inevitable consequence of that policy will be widespread bankruptcies. A number of hon. Members have made that point, if not used that language. That includes my hon. Friends the Members for East Lothian and for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger), the right hon. Member for Westmoreland and Lonsdale and the hon. Members for Richmond, Yorks, for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) and for Cambridgeshire, North-East. All have emphasised the damage that could be done to the industry if the Government go down the route that they have selected.

Thirdly, the Bill leaves the pricing of milk to free market forces, with major implications for the consumer and the processor. We are most uneasy about that approach. Jobs may be at stake. With those considerations in mind, we feel that we have no option but to divide the House. I ask hon. Members to join us in opposing the Bill.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): The speech of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) boded well for the Committee because it seemed that we would have a genuine debate about the Bill. The Bill is about how markets operate—a fascinating subject. Only in his last few moments did the hon. Gentleman revert to an apocalyptic vision of what he thinks will happen. I am sure that we will be able to reassure him that that will not be the case. After all, apocalypse now is what the dairy producers predicted when reform of the milk marketing system was first considered. Now, that argument has been won and people are talking merely about how we get from here to where everybody acknowledges we should be. The argument has been won on milk and the arguments on potatoes is one which we will win, and win by persuasion.

We have been debating three major commodities—milk, potatoes and wool. I join all hon. Members who have paid tribute to the long generations of milk marketing boards. We recognise the role that they have played both in rescuing the industry in the 1930s and in carrying it forward. It is no part of the Bill to confer a denigratory obituary on the scheme. However, the concerns of farmers in 1933 and those of farmers in 1993 are different, and the situation has changed.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) said, certain new factors radically alter the situation. There are milk quotas—and quotas that have a high value. Farmers are in a sellers' market. After all, Milk Marque, Nestlé and Northern Milk Partnership are fighting their way to the farm gate, competing for the milk. That is a happy situation. Milk Marque appears to intend to offer an equalised price to farmers, with the sort of guarantees that farmers enjoy under the existing system.

For those few hon. Members who suggested that we should be defending the status quo, I must point out that the status quo is beyond defence, not because of actions by the Government but simply because the situation and the market position have changed so much, and the legal challenges to semi-processed products are such that the threat was that the board would implode. No reasonable body—whether those running the board or those in government with a responsibility for agriculture—could take the chance of waiting for that to happen.

Therefore, sensible successor arrangements had to be worked out and it was important that the initiative and the proposals should come from the board. The hon. Gentleman says that the Government are responsible and that is true, but the proposal should be put forward by the board and we should then exercise our responsibility and our judgment in our response to that.

Hon. Members have said that there should be a process of consultation and the Bill provides for that. Before my right hon. Friend the Minister makes an order which would trigger the changes, he is obliged to consult all the people who might be concerned, whether processors, consumers, retailers or producers. That safeguard is already there.

I recognise that people on the other side of the argument have been concerned about the possible abuse of position by a successor body. The quota administration will not be in the hands of Milk Marque. We are discussing where that responsibility should lie. It might lie with the agricultural Departments or with the intervention board, but it will not lie with Milk Marque. That is clear.

Secondly, Dairy Crest must be floated before vesting day for Milk Marque. That is the largest part of the assets that will be distributed to dairy farmers. If, by mischance, it cannot be floated by that date, it must be put in neutral hands, such as a trust, to see it through until it can be launched upon its independent career. Therefore, we have taken care of that possibility. Prices will be set by the market. The milk marketing board, after the letter to which many hon. Members have referred, has issued a press release setting the record straight.

There is a triple safeguard against the abuse of dominant market position. First, there has to be ministerial approval. We shall look hard at what is put in front of us. There is no prior commitment to accept whatever Milk Marque does or whatever the milk board has put forward. We must consider whether it is a reasonable way of handling the question.

Secondly, there will be surveillance by Brussels. I see nothing wrong in there being provisional agreement to what is happening. It is natural that it should ensure that there is no abuse of market position. As I said earlier, the immunity from scrutiny by the Office of Fair Trading that the board enjoys because it is a co-operative organisation will be removed the second Milk Marque comes into existence. Therefore, Milk Marque will be subject to such scrutiny. Any hint that Milk Marque harbours monopolistic nostalgia will bring down the competition authorities before we can say "pinta". I am sure that the board know that that is the case.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, particularly as I have a major distribution company in my constituency, Wincanton Distribution, which will be affected by the proposals. What is worrying people is that the process of regulation by the Office of Fair Trading is a cumbersome one. To many, the presence of a regulator will overcome that problem. I hope that my hon. Friend will not close his mind to that problem as the Bill goes through Committee.

Mr. Curry: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but he will appreciate that the safeguards that I have outlined provide a sufficient framework, given that there will be severe competition in the marketplace. At all events, the board, which is responsible for putting the proposals forward, will have heard what my hon. Friend says and what many other hon. Members have said about the situation of the assets and their eventual fate.

I said that the board had, to put it politely, issued a clarification of its earlier circular, saying clearly that there was no attempt to intimidate future purchasers. It was not trying to wave the big stick over them. It understands that people who do not sign up can do so subsequently. It is not trying to create the impression among farmers that it is offering a surrogate monopoly. There is genuine concern, and I think that the board will have learnt from the episode that that is the wrong way in which to go about things. However, I appreciate its anxiety to reassure those who will buy milk, and the farmers who may sign up, that there will be a fundamental stability in the market place rather than a great dislocation.

I appreciate the concerns expressed about wool, perhaps more than many other people. My hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) and others have mentioned hill farmers, a good many of whom I represent. Let me outline the steps that have been taken. It has not been disputed that four years' notice was given of the ending of the wool guarantee, and the British Wool Marketing Board is not among the organisations quoted as having asked for a prolongation of that guarantee. I have engaged in long and detailed discussions with the board, and it appreciates that it is time to draw a line under the scheme.

[Mr. Curry]

We have helped to establish a £10 million reserve fund by exempting the board from interest charges and reducing the levies that it pays to the Treasury. We have recognised the need for a float. We have also urged the board—I have been personally involved in this—to take account of the need for a reorganisation of its structure. It has been presented with a report on how it can adapt itself to cope with the more competitive world in which it may be moving, but it has addressed the question with a certain lack of urgency. My hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen would perform a service by encouraging it to make its decisions a little more rapidly.

Mrs. Peacock: I hear what my hon. Friend is saying, but does he recall a conversation that he had with Donald Holdsworth, chairman of the Confederation of British Wool Textiles? Mr. Holdsworth and the confederation's members took a different view from that expressed by my hon. Friend on behalf of the wool marketing board, and I feel that that view should be addressed.

Mr. Curry: Having met Mr. Holdsworth twice, I clearly recollect the points that he put. I would say to him—as I say to my hon. Friend—that the balance has now swung towards farm support from the Community. Sheep farm wool plays a very marginal role in incomes. This year, total payments for farmers with hardy breeds in the less favoured areas amount to £30·50 per sheep from all sources in public support alone. Market prices are high, partly because of the buoyancy of the continental market. The hon. Member for Workington said that he wanted us to capture the continental markets, and he is right. One third of all the lambs that we produce on British hillsides are going straight into the overseas market place, benefiting the French consumer. I am delighted about that.

There is also an entirely new factor, which was not there even a few months ago: the ewe quota now has a value. We have seen the first sales, and a singificant new capital asset value has gone into the hills. We may not wish to capitalise and monetarise everything, but the fact remains that that development may well provide the security with which the dairy quota has provided dairy farmers.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give an assurance that the guaranteed wool price will not be abolished before the Bill is enacted?

Mr. Curry: No, I cannot do that. Royal Assent was expected to be rather earlier than it will be, for reasons that I need not spell out. It will not now happen before May, when provision for that financial guarantee will end. If we extended it, we should merely have to extend it until Royal Assent, which would lead to a pretty chaotic situation in the market. We shall therefore introduce a statutory instrument to end the guarantee—but it will only end the setting of the guarantee for this year, whereas the Bill removes the requirement to set a guarantee. The statutory instrument will not pre-empt the Bill, but it will get us out of a corner. I put it in those terms because that is the truth. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will appreciate my frankness. It is a timetabling problem—[Interruption.] Hon. Members would expect fairly basic language from Agriculture Ministers.

What the Bill does in respect of potatoes is very clear. It permits the Potato Marketing Board to nominate or suggest a successor organisation which can then take forward the essense of the board's work in terms of research and development and promotion. If that provision were not in the Bill and the board had to be wound up because of Community regulations, we should have no choice but to wind it up on the spot and to distribute the assets. We do not want that. The important research and development role should be taken forward and there should be continuity for the security of potato producers.

In addition, I anticipate that if farmers wish to organise themselves as potato marketing groups, they may well apply for marketing grants to which my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) referred. No doubt we should look at such applications closely to see whether we could help.

We must be very careful. The Potato Marketing Board is a curiously named organisation. It is actually a potato non-marketing board. It does not market potatoes. It polices quotas for which farmers pay £86·50 a hectare in levy. If a farmer plants potatoes for commercial reasons outside the board's scheme, he commits a criminal offence. That is something of an anomaly in today's circumstances.

There are two threads in our thinking about potatoes. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I could easily say that it was all a Brussels problem. We could say that the proposals came from Brussels and that we did not ask for them. We could say that they came forward because the Commission felt that they were part of the completion of the single market. We could say, "Well, sorry, it's all very unfortunate, but we are going to be forced to adopt this and that's the end of the argument."

Very few member states want something other than a very lightweight regime. Our present area quotas and intervention would be incompatible with the proposal. As my right hon. Friend the Minister has said, we believe that it would be difficult to argue in Brussels, in respect of the one commodity for which there is no regime and no Communitywide intervention, for intervention or that we should retain limits on our producers when no one else in the Community will face such limits. That concept would be rather difficult to sell.

The second thread is the economic argument. I admit that there are questions about whether the surplus scheme serves the United Kingdom interest now.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister give a frank response to this question? I understand that Ministers have received information from several sources about subsidies paid to processors and producers of potatoes from various countries within the Community. Will the Minister give an undertaking at the Dispatch Box that he will provide all that information to the members of the Standing Committee that will consider the Bill?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman can have any information that I have. However, I do not recall receiving any brown envelopes containing that information.

There are genuine questions about whether the surplus scheme serves the United Kingdom interest in respect of the loss of market share in seed potatoes, the migration of opportunity and fears of loss of manufacturing capacity in the processed sector.

The market has shifted. In 1975, we consumed 143 lb of potatoes per head. That is a lot of potatoes. That figure declined to 110 lb per head last year. However, the consumption of crisps and potato products has risen from 7 lb per head to nearly 17 lb per head and consumption of frozen chips has risen from 4·7 lb per head to nearly 18 lb per head. We must consider those figures in the context of a slightly declining market in potatoes overall.

The market is shifting. We are anxious that where there are high-value opportunities the United Kingdom should maintain its very significant lead in what is a high-tech part of the industry. This is at the heart of our concern about the present scheme. We know that potato producers are concerned, and we do not wish to have a long period of uncertainty. We should like to settle the issue with the Community and get agreement on the scheme. That is why the Bill contains provisions to avoid an hiatus between any agreement in Brussels and the creation of a successor organisation in the United Kingdom. Even though the structures are to change, we shall be able to assure farmers of the continuity that is essential to their business.

The processors, whom some people regard as the demons at the feast, have an interest in maintaining the loyalty of the people who sell to them. They certainly have no interest in disregarding the producers who have sold to them for years and in going to an entirely different marketplace. As many hon. Members have said, potatoes are a high-tech business. Farmers have to be properly equipped. The efficient producer may well expand his acreage. Over the years we have seen consolidation and a declining number of producers. This measure may merely emphasise a tendency. I shall be surprised if, ultimately, it has a more draconian effect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks said that investment is taking place already. Of course it is. Nobody is suggesting that absolutely nothing is happening, that the system is frozen rigid. It is quite clear that processors are investing in Britain despite this scheme, not because of it. They will be able to anticipate increased investment in the event of the freeing of the marketplace. We believe that that argument must be taken seriously. The export of acreage and of added value is of genuine concern to us. However, we want to ensure that we advance in a positive and sensible manner so that there will be a future for potato growing in England and that we shall have an expanded share of the market.

The marketing grants are an uncontroversial but important aspect of the Bill. The grant schemes were deliberately launched in a fairly low key. We were not out for some sort of big bang. We have looked very hard at the schemes to ensure that they are viable. The problem arises from the fact that the current legislative framework is inadequate. We cannot look at the sectors that involve more processing, and processors cannot be brought into schemes very efficiently. Thus, we want more room for manoeuvre. We want marketing schemes that will enable us to respond more satisfactorily to the problems that are experienced in the marketplace. I am sure that this will be welcomed as a sensible addition to our armoury.

All hon. Members agree that British food is extremely good. We want to see more of it being eaten. We want to see more of our own products capturing our markets, as well as getting into the export markets. As I said earlier, one third of our lamb goes overseas, and we have a significant export trade in beef and in pigmeat. At the same time, in several high-value processed sectors, commodities are being imported into Britain, while, to some extent, commodities are produced in Britain and exported.

There is little that we can do with milk, in the sense that we have quotas. Because of the quotas, we are unable to increase our output and, thereby, reconquer the whole of our market. Therefore, we are trying to focus production where added value is to be found, where the jobs are and where the future technology lies. With potatoes, we have the opposite situation. We do not have a quota crisis. If we can get our act together, we shall be able to satisfy all our own needs. That is what we are aiming for. In respect of wool, the marketing situation has changed dramatically in recent years. We do not think that the fears that have been expressed will be realised.

The Bill is about opportunity—opportunity for farmers, opportunity for industry, and opportunity for producers to have better access to British products. It is a Bill about deregulation. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) vetoed the Hedgerows Bill on the ground that it was too regulatory. I am sure that he will welcome deregulation of some of the current marketing scene. The Bill is about competition, but, above all, it is about the future of British agriculture. I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Trade Union Ballots

10.16 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Funds for Trade Union Ballots Regulations (Revocation) Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 233), dated 8th February 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th February, be annulled.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Order Paper says that this instrument has not been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. It was considered this afternoon, and the Joint Committee has placed in the Vote Office a report to the effect that a section of the instrument is redundant because of the effect of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill. I thought that I should draw the attention of the House to this, because once again the Government are hurrying through delegated legislation without giving adequate time for the Joint Committee to give proper consideration to it. The Committee Clerk has made special efforts to ensure that the House is informed about this matter.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member, as ever, is helpful to the House.

Mr. Dobson: The regulations would cut off the funds which the Government have, for the past 13 years, provided to cover the cost of trade union secret ballots. In future, the cost will have to be borne by the members of each union. Last year, these ballots cost £4·25 million. That is quite a lot of money, and certainly a lot of money to be found from the voluntary contributions of members of trade unions, which are voluntary organisations without large sources of finance.

This decision is entirely typical of the events of the past week or so, because it is another Tory promise broken and another Tory betrayal of the people who trusted them. Last week's Budget extended VAT, put up national insurance and increased income tax, all in blatant betrayal of promises made during the 1992 general election. This week the Government go back on a promise made at an earlier general election, that of 1979, when they promised in their election manifesto to "provide public funds for postal ballots for union elections and other important issues."

At that time, ballots were not going to be made compulsory. Now, after the Government have made these ballots compulsory, the funding is to be taken away. The Government have no mandate for this. They have never raised it in any consultative document. They did not put it to the people at the last general election, and it is therefore contrary to the promises made at the outset and repeated at every later stage in the development of the Government's industrial relations policy.

The present Government, the present Prime Minister and the present Secretary of State for Employment all attempt to present what might be described as Thatcherism with a human face. Yet is has to be remembered that Margaret Thatcher and Norman Tebbit promised to provide those funds, and to be fair to Margaret Thatcher and Norman Tebbit, they delivered them. Yet this Prime Minister, this Employment Secretary and this Government are taking those funds away. They are breaking that promise. The Prime Minister is exceedingly keen on charters, we understand, and clearly, if he is going to cover everyone against the Tory party, he will have to produce a twisters charter to keep an eye on them.

It is not just the Government in general who are twisting and betraying their promises. Individual Tory Members have committed themselves in the past to the provision of these funds. A quick look through earlier debates shows that at least 15 existing Tory Members spoke in favour of the ballots. So far as I can see, not one of those who spoke in the past ever suggested that these funds would be withdrawn at a later stage. Not even any hon. Member on the far right suggested that they should not be provided or should be withdrawn.

The present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the right hon. and learned Member for Tunbridge Wells (Sir P. Mayhew), then the junior Employment Minister, said in 1980 that trade unions were being told: "You do not have to have a secret ballot for any of your decisions—it is up to you; but if you are thinking of having one, you do not have to worry about the cost, for the taxpayer will reimburse you." Not any more, Paddy.

The present Minister of State, Foreign Office, the right hon. and learned Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) commended the merits of these funds when he said of that 1980 Bill:

"It provides for the establishment of a fund from which secret ballots are to be financed", and went on:

"That proposal is one to which no reasonable-minded Member could object."—[Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 138.]

I wonder what he will do in the vote tonight.

The present Minister of State for Social Security, the right hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), said:

"The Bill is simply making funds available so that the resources of unions that want to have ballots are not under pressure."

He went on:

"This at least frees them from that constraint."—[Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 99.]

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I will not. It is a very short debate, and I do not have time to give way.

The right hon. and hon. Members whom I have mentioned are at present Ministers of the Crown, and they now expect people to take them at their word when they make a promise on behalf of the Government on Northern Ireland, foreign affairs or matters to do with social security. It is quite clear that there is no chance that anybody will take a promise from them.

When the ballots were made compulsory, in 1984, the then Employment Secretary——

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I will not.

The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) gave this reassurance at the point when ballots were going to be made compulsory:

"The money provided under the 1980 Act to meet the cost of such ballots will continue to be available."—[Official Report, 8 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 160.]

He is here tonight, and I wonder which way he will be voting.

I could give other examples. For instance, the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover), told the House on that occasion:

"I support the measures in this Bill, particularly the secret ballots to be paid for by the Government, because ordinary trade union members in my constituency have been crying out for this every day virtually since the general election."

Mr. Oppenheim rose——

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Dobson: I am willing to bet that the ordinary——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have a point of order, to which I must listen.

Mr. Nicholls: Would it be in order, Madam Speaker, for you to remind the hon. Members on the Labour Front Bench that this is supposed to be a debate, not a boring monologue?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that it is not the responsibility of the Chair to instruct hon. Members who have the floor that they must give way. It certainly is a courtesy in a debate. The hon. Gentleman is determined that he will not give way for the present, so the hon. Member must bide his time.

Mr. Oppenheim: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you saying that we have been discourteous?

Madam Speaker: I am not saying anything of the kind; I am saying that the hon. Gentleman must bide his time. I think that it was a point of frustration, not a point of order.

Mr. Dobson: Generally speaking, Madam Speaker, I attempt to be courteous to all hon. Members, but there are a number of Members on the Benches opposite who are so notoriously and continuously discourteous that they cannot expect courtesy from this side of the House. Both the hon. Gentlemen who have raised spurious points of order fall into that category.

I should like to ask the hon. Member for Chorley whether any of those ordinary trade union members in his constituency have been crying out for these funds to be taken away. I do not suppose that he told them at the general election that the Government intended to take them away, and I do not suppose that he has told them since, but we have to ask ourselves why the Tories are doing this. We can reasonably say that it is a typical example of Tory spite against trade union members, but I do not think it is only that.

One reason for them taking away the funds at this time is political fund ballots. Up to know, the renewal of political funds by ballot could be financed from Government funds. The Government have forced ballots on trade unions; they have forced postal ballots and therefore, not unreasonably, they funded those postal ballots. They are now about to withdraw that facility, just as another round of political fund ballots appears on the horizon. It is not just spite against the trade unions; it is malice against the Government's political opponents. They have done everything they could by law to obstruct the funding of the Labour party and any political opposition from trade unions.

The trade unions have, rightly, for a long time contributed substantially to the funds of the Labour party through open and democratic decisions reached by British nurses, dinner ladies, miners and railway workers. The Tories have never liked it, and at every chance they have attempted to obstruct it. By this measure, they are attempting to make the process more expensive and to ensure that less money is available for political activities both directly by the unions and by the Labour party. Therefore, it is necessary to contrast this with the process by which the Tory party raises its funds.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Dobson: I shall not give way. Unlike the trade unions, who face innumerable legal obstructions——

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A few moments ago you said that you anticipated that the hon. Gentleman would want to give way when he had recovered his nerve. Would now be an appropriate moment for him to do so?

Madam Speaker: It is for the hon. Gentleman who has the Floor and is at the Dispatch Box to determine when he is going to give way.

Mr. Dobson: We can reasonably contrast the legal obstructions to raising and disbursing political funds by trade unions which the Government have placed into law with the absence of virtually any obstruction to the funding of the Tory party.

Take company law, for instance. Companies do not have to establish any special political funds; they can make contributions to the Tory party out of their general funds. Nor do they have to conduct a ballot of anybody before they decide to do so. Just a few rich Tories can simply hand over money to the Tory party. Let us take as an example Thames Water, an organisation which is a taxing authority, because——

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to start talking about water charges when he is not prepared to give way to Conservative Members on the subject of trade union ballots?

Madam Speaker: It is for the hon. Gentleman to determine what he has to say. It is not for the Chair to involve itself with the comments of hon. Members.

Mr. Dobson: The point I am making, in case the hon. Gentleman cannot understand it, is that the processes whereby trade unions raise funds and use them for political purposes are decided democratically by way of ballots. There is no ballot involved in the decision of Thames Water, the monopoly supplier of water to people in its area, when it levies what everyone recognises as a water tax—known as the water rate—which people cannot avoid. From that tax, Thames Water has been giving money to the Tory party. There was no democracy or ballot there.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): On a point of order. In a debate on trade union balloting, Madam Deputy Speaker, is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to spend his time talking about Thames Water, Conservative party funding and all sorts of irrelevant matters that have nothing whatever to do with trade union ballots?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I have only just come to the Chair, and I want to listen carefully. It will be easier for me to do so if there is less noise.

Mr. Dobson: For ease of reference, Madam Deputy Speaker, when Madam Speaker was in the Chair I said that it was proper to contrast the arrangements made by law by the Government for the accrual and disposal of funds for political purposes by trade unions with what happens when companies and other people donate to the Tory party, and she accepted that.

No ballots are involved when people raise money for the Tory party. Only one ballot has been conducted by a company, National Freight, and the shareholders voted overwhelmingly against giving the party any money.

In the interests of democracy, what happens with funds from Britain is bad enough, but when we contrast the different arrangements, we must also consider the Tories' keenness on democracy when it comes to raising money from people from abroad. It raised £2 million from John Latsis, a Greek fascist who was involved with the colonels in the killing and torture of the people of Greece.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order to call Robert Maxwell a Greek fascist just because he contributed substantial funds to the Labour party?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair, and I notice that the hon. Gentleman raised several points of order before I came to the Chair.

Mr. Dobson: No one in their right mind would suggest that giving money to the Tory party makes someone a fascist. What makes them a fascist is supporting the Greek colonels, who murdered and tortured Greek people who stood up for democracy.

Within Britain, there was the case of Mr. Azil Nadir, who unlawfully shifted more than £400,000 of his company's funds to the Tory party, without declaring them in the company's returns. The Tories were in effect receiving stolen goods, and they have not returned them to the shareholders or to the administrator. No ballots were taken then.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to spend his entire speech in our debate on an important issue talking about Conservative party funding, fascists, Greeks and all sorts of people around the world rather than dealing with the issue in question?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have been trying to follow what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has been saying. I should prefer it if hon. Members left me to decide what is in order and what is not. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that, while passing reference may properly be made to other matters, he must now—having sketched in the background—deal more closely with the subject under direct consideration.

Mr. Oppenheim: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. If it is in order for Opposition Members to talk, in passing, about Tory party funding, might it also be in order for Conservative Members—if they are called later—to talk in passing about the filthy Maxwell money that the Labour party accepted before the last election?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I shall wait to hear what is said first.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): I was listening carefully to what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said about trade union ballots. When the legislation was passed 10 or more years ago, it was mainly targeted on postal ballots. I should be interested to hear from the hon. Gentleman whether the secret ballots benefit the trade union movement, and whether there might be a move away from postal ballots if the funds were not continued.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman has not been keeping up with the increasingly draconian state of industrial relations law under the party of which he is a member. In future, all ballots will have to be postal ballots. It is curious that, at a time when postal ballots were voluntary, the Government agreed to fund them, but now that they are compulsory, the Government are taking away that funding.

One of the problems we face when dealing with this subject is that we have never seen anything from the Government to justify the termination of the provision of the funds. Therefore, we have to guess what the Minister is going to say. My speech is based on the assumption that the Minister will use certain arguments, one of which will involve the need for democracy in the unions. Another argument that he might use is that the process is costing the taxpayer money, so it is unfair to taxpayers.

Therefore, it is necessary to contrast the limited sums that the taxpayer is providing—£4·25 million in the last year for which figures are available—with the cost to the taxpayer of some of the ways in which the Conservative party has been raising money. We now know from several sources that rich foreigners who live in this country have been granted enormous tax breaks by the Government, in exchange, in effect, for donations to the Conservative party. It is true that several of those rich foreigners were invited to No. 10 Downing street for a meal at the taxpayer's expense. But that fell a long way short of the total cost to the taxpayer, as the foreigners were then promised by the Prime Minister that the present tax laws would not be changed if the Conservative party won the election, and they coughed up money for Conservative party funds.

The process cost the taxpayer vastly more than the £4·2 million—the cost of all the ballots, not just political fund ballots. The decision cost the taxpayer hundreds of millions of pounds, which the rich foreigners will not have to pay.

I say—with some care—that secret deals at the expense of the taxpayer in exchange for donations to party funds are utterly unacceptable to the people of this country. At this moment, politicians in Italy are being prosecuted for exactly that offence, and it is likely that they will go to gaol for such processes. We have corrupt arrangements that are costing the taxpayer a fortune and utterly straightforward——

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is making some extremely serious and scurrilous accusations without any evidence. Will you ask him to withdraw the accusations of corruption or prove them?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I understand it, the points are generalised. The rules of the House relate to accusations made against individual Members. However, I am sure that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) will wish to maintain the highest tone in his remarks.

Mr. Dobson: It is my desire——

Mr. Cormack: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman's accusations are clearly directed at my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The hon. Gentleman is accusing my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of corruption, which cannot be in order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not what I understood him to say.

Mr. Dobson: I certainly believe in maintaining the highest standards of integrity. It is right and proper for the reputation of this country to maintain those standards in the funding of all political parties.

Mr. Cormack: Is the hon. Gentleman accusing the Prime Minister of corruption? If so, what evidence does he have?

Mr. Dobson: I am saying that the Tory party is guilty of corruption, and I shall maintain that until the day the Conservatives publish their funding details and prove to us that they have not had any money from Robert Maxwell.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify his remark that Downing street paid for a Tory party function out of the taxpayers' purse? Is that his accusation against the Prime Minister?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Lady misunderstands me.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): My hon. Friend did not mention the name of the caterers.

Mr. Dobson: No, I did not. But a dinner was held at Downing street, paid for by the taxpayer, and it turned out to be rather advantageous to the Tory party—let us leave it at that.

By contrast with all this shifty, seedy raising of foreign money to fund the Tory party—because hardly anyone in Britain will make contributions to it—the trade unions have been finding life more and more difficult throughout the recession. Now, all the costs involved in these ballots will have to be met, not from Government funds, but from the pockets and handbags of ordinary British trade union members. The money will come from income on which they have paid tax and national insurance, unlike the income that goes to the Tory party.

The decisions taken by Britain's trade unions are open and democratic. This process will make them more expensive. It is intended to undermine their capacity to achieve something like parity or bargaining power with the employers. It is part of the Government's effort to force wages lower and to force our people to work longer hours in worse conditions. This measure is intended to undermine the resources that the unions have for political action.

[Mr. Dobson]

But it is my view that, instead of doing that, it will strengthen their resolve to get rid of this Government, who betray their promises and betray the British people in the interests of the rich, who want to drive down wages, and of the limited number of rich foreigners who want the benefits of living in this country without having to pay their fair share of the costs of running it.

10.43 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): I have just heard an interesting sedentary exchange originated by my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), who shouted to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), "You could have done better than this," to which the latter replied, "Yes, I would hope so." I expect that most of us could have done better than the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) did. We have heard a series of nasty, unsubstantiated, scurrilous allegations which the hon. Gentleman failed to prove.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey) rose——

Mr. Riddick: The trade union reforms that the Government have brought to the House over the past 14 years have been a success. The unions have become more democratic. The Government were responsible for the introduction of ballots for the election of trade union officers and ballots before strike action can be taken. We now have trade union leaders who have to respond to what the members want rather than members responding to what the leaders want.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): When will the Tory party introduce some democracy into its funding? Why does the hon. Gentleman not answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)?

Mr. Riddick: The majority of the money that the Conservative party receives is raised from ordinary, individual members in the constituencies.

We have also brought the trade unions within a reasonable framework of law. All those changes have been brought about in the face of intractable, determined opposition from Labour Members. They have voted against all the trade union measures that we have brought before the House. They voted against all the ballots that we have set up.

The closed shop, as much as anything, kindled my interest in politics in the 1970s. The then Labour Government gave carte blanche to trade union leaders to force employees to belong to trade unions. I was looking through my files for the debate tonight and came across an excellent article in a fine newspaper called The Free Nation, produced by the National Association for Freedom—an excellent organisation. The heading is, "Commissar Jones's orders". Here is part of what Jack Jones, the then leader of the Transport and General Workers Union, wrote to his members. He said:

"we can now go ahead with closed shop or 100 per cent. agreements in the knowledge that it will be fair for an employer to dismiss in circumstances of enforcing such an agreement . . . I hope you will advise your officers and shop stewards about the legislation and ensure that maximum efforts are made to achieve 100 per cent. membership wherever possible."

In other words, he was perfectly happy for workers to be put on the dole queue if they refused to join a trade union. When we hear lessons from Mr. Jones about pensioners, we should not forget his past.

It is not surprising that the Labour party has opposed all our legislation. It always has been and always will be beholden to the trade unions. Of the 271 Labour Members of Parliament, 152 are sponsored by trade unions. All 20 of the shadow Cabinet are sponsored by trade unions. The trade unions contributed some £5 million to the Labour party general election fund.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): There is no secret about what the hon. Gentleman has just been telling the House. All that information is freely available, declared and publicised. When will the Conservative party behave in a similar fashion about contributions from the likes of Li Kha Shing?

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): Is the hon. Gentleman swearing?

Mr. Riddick: I do not know.

The Labour party is beholden to the trade unions. The Conservative party is supported by business, but business creates wealth. We are happy to be supported by private enterprise, by the wealth creators. [Interruption.] I heard a Labour Member shout "crooks". One could not get a bigger crook than Mr. Maxwell, and whom did he support? What is more, he was a Labour Member of Parliament.

I should like to return to debating the order.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Before doing so, will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Riddick: No, I shall not give way.

I recognise the difficulty that the regulations will create for some of the trade unions, but they cannot be immune from the recession or the public deficit that we face today. If the Government are faced with the choice of spending money on hospitals or subsidising trade union ballots, there is no contest: the money must be spent on the public services. It is perfectly reasonable to ask trade unions to fund their ballots. We should not forget that the Trades Union Congress has never recommended that its affiliated unions make use of the scheme. Until 1985, TUC-affiliated trade unions boycotted the scheme.

I am not hostile to the trade unions. My advice to anyone who has a bad employer is to join a trade union. Anyone who has a good employer generally does not need the services of a trade union. My advice to my wife when she was working before she had our first baby was to belong to a trade union and to stay in it. She worked in an art gallery and her employer was a Labour-controlled council. I thought that it was important that she should be in a trade union so that the union could protect her against some of the worst excesses of that Labour-controlled council.

The reality is that in the past 14 years it has been the Conservative Government who have had the guts to tackle the excesses of the trade unions. I am happy to support the regulations tonight.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I am bound to wonder what the Government's attitude would be if the majority of trade unions supported the Conservative party. I suspect that they would be less enthusiastic about removing this small amount of funding from trade unions.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) rightly advised his wife to remain a member of a trade union. However, the distinction that he sought to draw between people who work for good employers and people who work for poor employers is a bad point.

[Mr. Alex Carlile]

I have always understood that the Conservative party is not opposed to trade unions as such. I understand that many members of the Conservative party are members of, and active in, trade unions. Surely they and hon. Members on both sides of the House should agree that people should join trade unions for their own protection. What Conservative Members seem to object to is not so much trade unions in themselves as the fact that they perceive that trade union members feel compelled to support the Labour party.

The present decline of civil legal aid under the Lord Chancellor's latest proposals and the fact that claimants under civil legal aid will be obliged to make a contribution from the outset, provide a good justification for us as Members of Parliament advising constituents to be members of trade unions.

I have considerable professional experience of acting for trade unionists in civil pesonal injury claims. There is no doubt that even when legal aid was more widely available for such claims, the trade union legal assistance scheme on the whole provided a better and more expert service.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) said that he would encourage anyone who had a bad employer to join a trade union. Is the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) aware that 10 days ago there was an Adjournment debate about an industrial dispute that has been going on for months in the west midlands and I do not think that anyone would argue that the employer concerned is a bad one? There was a ballot and the vote was overwhelmingly in favour of joining a union. Yet the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin), defended the employer's action in refusing to recognise the right of those people to join a union and gave every possible excuse why that employer should not recognise the people involved.

Mr. Carlile: As ever, the hon. Gentleman has made his point powerfully; but I was trying to make the point that not only those working for bad employers, but those working for good employers, are well advised to join trade unions—partly, at least, because of the benefits available to members, particularly in relation to union legal aid.

There is a second reason why those with good employers should join trade unions; a good employer can obtain nothing but benefit from the fact that his employees are union members. He will find it far easier to negotiate, discuss health and safety and deal with common problems that arise if he can do so through the elected representatives of those employees. The best possible elected representatives are responsible trade union officials who have been elected by the employees, and can represent the views of their members not on a whim but on the basis of well-organised and well-constructed union consultation.

I feel that the regulations and the political thinking that underlies it, are purely an attempt to bash the unions because they happen to support the Labour party—but even that is misguided as a political view of the position. Under the existing arrangements, the Government have a stake in trade union ballots: because they fund the ballots, they can enforce the funding regulations. If the existing regulations are breached, they can take the trade union concerned to court for not following those regulations. If the regulations are enacted, they will lose, at a stroke, a considerable degree of lateral influence over the unions. That strikes me as a very bad move, which will do nothing for industrial relations—and, indeed, will encourage many trade union members who may not be inclined to support Labour to decide that the Government are out to damage their interests in the workplace.

The sum involved is so small, and the gain to industrial relations and union-Government relations so obvious, that I ask the Minister to reconsider whether the changes are really in the public interest.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I pay tribute to the hundreds of thousands of trade union members who give their time voluntarily to serve their fellows at work. When we talk of those intermediate groups in society, we are not talking merely of members of ward committees, Labour or Tory, or about those involved in churches, chapels, mosques, temples or synagogues; we are talking of a body of people that, at its peak, comprised between 250,000 and 300,000 people who served as shop stewards, working often for no thanks and always for no pay.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) pointed out that they have taken up issues that matter to individuals: issues such as accidents at work, health and safety and general representation.

It is beyond dispute that the trade unions have gone wrong at times, but the fact that they have now come right is also well established—partly because of the move towards free and fair elections.

The serious point made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was that the regulations have come about with virtually no notice and no discussion. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will explain why the announcement that the ballot money would be cut off was made so suddenly; most of us were surprised by that announcement.

The issue of the money itself is slightly less important. In the case of a union subscription of about £60 a year, the cost of a postal ballot is not so very great——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Yes, it is.

Mr. Bottomley: I leave the hon. Gentleman to make that point if he wishes.

If we are to be fair, we must consider other issues. Some parts of the union subscription cover matters which are tax-deductible, but only a small number of union members apply for tax relief on those parts. If some parts of the funds are allowable for tax relief, it would be fair if they were dealt with automatically so that individual members need not have to discover that they qualify. We would then show that we do not keep money from trade unions to which their members are legally entitled. That is one way in which the Government could avoid the accusation that they are union bashing.

I will leave it to other hon. Members to point out something that was not covered by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras—Labour's attitude to state funding of union ballots. When I was a Minister at the Department of Employment I went to the Trades Union Congress and I managed to live quite well and be more than a light drinker by offering to pay for the drinks of all my friends in the trade union movement. They said, "Government money? Not a hope." I lived on their money for virtually a week. The idea that the Labour party supports the funding is not consistent.

We can go a stage further. Should we assume that members of trade unions are members of trade unions which support the Labour party? Half the members of trade unions are in unions which do not have political funds and, of course, not every union fund is openly dedicated to the Labour party. If a diplomat tried to comment on the relationship between trade unions and political parties in this country, he would say that there were matters of substance and of direction. It would help trade unions if they shook themselves free of the association with the Labour party.

It was honourable for the trade unions to establish a political party. The lives of many trade unionists around the world are threatened and even ended because the trade unions stand for democracy and for an alternative to a dictatorial regime. We do not have dictorial regime in this country, but in many countries such as in central America, Africa and many parts of Asia, being an active member of a trade union is to volunteer for intimidation and to suffer the kind of violence that people in the United Kingdom may suffer from the IRA. It is as bad as that, as I saw in El Salvador.

If the trade unions with political funds which backed the Labour party at the last four elections, and backed the loser four times in a row, were more neutral in their political interests and were actively involved with both major political parties, they might do much better than by supporting just one political party. However, that is a matter for those unions and that is why the political fund ballot will be interesting in 1995.

With regard to the relationship, there are points of strength and of weakness. The Tory Government and Tory voters can be congratulated on helping to get trade unions away from their dominant political role, which was unhealthy for them and for the country, and back to a position where we can openly say that trade union members and their families are one of the largest groups of Conservative voters.

However, we do not always earn those votes by our actions. For example, it would be healthy if we said, in respect of the Timex dispute, that the management are using tactics ill suited to the United States and not at home in this country at all. When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoke up about the people who were arrested in the demonstration, he pointed out that those who were arrested were not workers at the factory and he was right.

The workers should be proud that they have stayed within the law. When trade union members do that, even though Government do not take sides in an industrial dispute Conservatives should say that they do not like management rolling back wages and conditions arbitrarily. That may sometimes be necessary to stay in business, but we should take a more even-handed approach. It is not our job simply to be on the side of industry as represented by management. We should also be on the side of industry as represented by the workers.

Mr. Frank Cook: Careful—they are getting a bit tetchy on the Front Bench, lad.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not need any help from Opposition Members just at the moment.

We need a network of co-operation, and that means trying to work with the democrats within the trade union movement to provide an election system which the members recognise to be fair.

Those of us who are members of building societies as lenders or borrowers are involved in secret ballots on this, that or the other, and we are aware that that practice is not an unusual thing in the network of institutions which have helped to build up the better parts of this country and have helped people when they required help.

As the Minister will be aware, I believe, that there is sometimes a lack of coherence in our approach. When we consider issues such as the way in which the mining communities were shattered by the form of the announcement in the autumn, and the fact that the courts said that some of that action was unlawful, I wonder whether all the industrial relations experience of the Department of Employment and of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service has suddenly vanished. In my day that sort of thing would never have happened. Ministers and civil servants in the Department and, for that matter, outsiders would have said, "You can't do that—look at the law." In respect of these regulations, we are looking at one part of the law.

We need to create an organic relationship with trade unions and their members. We need to consult them about the things which affect them. In the case of this issue, I do not believe that we did consult them. I may be wrong about that; my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to tell me if I am.

I want to speak now as a party politician. The bulk of relationships between people in the Conservative party and trade unionists should be conducted on a people-to-people basis, involving individuals. Let me say something about my own trade union. It is fine to go sponsoring Members of Parliament and to have meetings of those Members, but why, in my seventeen and a half years as a member of that union, have I been excluded on every occasion as a consequence of my not being sponsored?

I am a member of the union, but I am excluded from the meeting. Every time there is to be a new general secretary, I write and ask for an invitation, but I am always refused on the grounds that my election expenses are not met. If the purpose of paying election expenses is to have union members elected to this House, but someone is elected without that sponsorship, what is the democratic reason for that Member's exclusion from all meetings? They cannot all be intended to help the Labour party. If so, they are not very effective. Some of them must be about issues with which the House is dealing.

We need a periods of hard reflection. It is not a question simply of being hard in thought. We must avoid giving the impression of being hard of heart and soft in the head. The Labour party needs to think through its relationship with the trade unions, as does the Tory party, and when the Government are thinking of doing something which will affect trade unions they ought to treat those bodies as they treat other people in society: they ought to consult them and then make their decision, rather than make their decision as a substitute for consultation.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): Like all my right hon. and hon. Friends, I take the view that this is a foolish and mistaken measure. It is foolish because, whether or not they realise it, the Government have fundamentally contradicted what has been the central theme of their industrial relations policy for more than 14 years.

Since 1979, the Government have lectured the Opposition about the need to improve democracy in the trade union movement. My view is that we should take no lectures about democracy from the Conservative party. If and when it turns itself into a democratic party and publishes its accounts, we may be more prepared to pay attention to what it says. Throughout the past 14 years, the Government have told us that the trade unions are not democratic. We have been told that there is a need to promote the use of postal and workplace ballots in the decision-making processes. At the same time, the Government have claimed that this is not a burden on the trade union movement, as public funds are available for reimbursement of the costs. From tonight, that will not be the case. At a stroke, the Government have undermined their fundamental argument and contradicted the main theme of their industrial relations reform.

This is a mistaken measure, as it will compromise the ability of many trade unions, particularly the smaller ones that make heavy use of the reimbursement scheme——

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hutton: No. I intend to make some progress.

The regulations will compromise the ability of many trade unions, particularly the smaller ones, to comply with the mandatory ballot requirements imposed by successive measures since 1980. It is worth bearing in mind the fact that the Government always gave the impression that the refund scheme was permanent and was necessary to help trade unions to meet their new legal obligations. In fact, it might be educational for Conservative Members if they were to be reminded of what the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) said as Secretary of State for Employment. On 8 November 1983, when introducing the Trade Union Bill, he said:

"I hope that whenever possible unions will make use of postal ballots. The money provided under the 1980 Act to meet the cost of such ballots will continue to be available. —[Official Report, 8 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 160.]

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Did the hon. Gentleman perhaps consult his Back-Bench colleague the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg)? If we are to quote debates, the hon. Member said in the debate on the Employment Bill on 17 December 1979,

"The trade union movement has not asked for it"—

that is, funds—

"and there is no evidence that the trade union movement cannot afford to run secret ballots." [Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 488.]

He said it.

Mr. Hutton: I am quite sure that my hon. Friend is able to defend himself, if he wants to, on that point.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I do not like replying to someone else's intervention, and it was very improper of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) to quote me in an intervention in someone else's speech. However, if I may answer the point, when I made that speech 12 million people were members of trade unions in this country. They were able to act independently because of the funds which 12 million members generated. The whole basis of opposing it at that time was the knowledge that the Government were setting about introducing legislation which was intended to restrict the trade union movement.

Since then, they have introduced the legislation and it has restricted the trade union movement. They have also created, through the folly of their policies, 3 million unemployed people. In that pincer movement they have caught the trade unions. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) shakes his head. He does not like it, but he should not make smart remarks and then be unable to defend them. The trade union movement has been nobbled and, to a large extent, destroyed by the activities of this Government, and evidence of that is the fact that they are withdrawing this funding, which shows that introducing it in the first place was a sham and a lie.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that comment. I was sure that he would be able to respond to the point that the hon. Member for Gravesham made, and I was correct in my assessment. The hon. Gentleman should also bear in mind that what was true in 1980 is not true in 1993, because the balloting regime that the Government have imposed over the past few years has changed dramatically from the one that was introduced in 1980. That was exclusively a voluntary scheme; now it is essentially mandatory. The balloting mechanisms themselves have also changed beyond recognition.

Nor was there any mention of the Government's intention to withdraw the refund scheme for trade union ballots in the manifesto on which Conservative Members were elected in 1992. It is clear from the Hansard record of proceedings relating to the refund scheme for trade union ballots, that it was always the Government's intention to make this funding available. Now they have changed their minds.

The scheme provides important practical help to trade unions and is thus a direct benefit to trade union members and to their employers as well. The figures from the annual report of the certification officer bear out the relevance and importance of the rebate scheme. The last year for which we have an annual report from the certification officer is 1991. In that year, 78 trade unions, both large and small, made applications for refunds in respect of more than 700 ballots, and the certification officer paid over £4 million in refunds to those trade unions.

It is also interesting—I am sure that Conservative Members will benefit from doing this—to look at the list of unions and organisations that made use of the refund scheme. They were not large, TUC-affiliated trade unions; many were small, non-TUC-affiliated unions, including, for example, the Royal College of Nursing, the Royal College of Midwives and the Health Visitors Association. The value of the scheme is demonstrated by the range of organisations that make use of it.

The Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill will also add considerably to the cost of trade union ballots by removing the discretion over the conduct of workplace ballots and requiring external scrutiny of those ballots as well. By moving away from the discretion on conduct of workplace ballots, the Government have added considerably to the cost of conducting the ballots. There is no doubt that workplace ballots are considerably cheaper to operate than fully postal ballots. While we are in the mood to quote from previous speeches, perhaps I can refer again to the speech by the right hon. Member for Bridgwater on 8 November 1983, when he said:

"I am not convinced that postal ballots are always the best means of ensuring maximum participation in elections . . . A workplace ballot . . . may often be a more effective means of getting voting papers into the hands of trade union members, as a comparison between some unions which operate postal ballots and others which operate workplace ballots clearly shows."—[Official Report, 8 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 160.]

I wonder why it is, therefore, that at a time when the Government are about to withdraw the rebate scheme for trade union ballots, they have extended considerably not only the range of subjects covered by the obligation to ballot but the actual mechanism by which the ballot itself may be conducted. Why have the Government chosen this moment to withdraw the scheme?

The Government's case cannot be based on public expenditure criteria, as the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) suggested earlier. In the context of a debate about public expenditure, it is important to talk about the options available to the Department of Employment and not make comparisons between expenditure of the Department of Employment and the Department of Health, as the hon. Gentleman did.

If we are talking about the Department of Employment and its expenditure criteria and priorities, is it not extraordinary that, at a time when the Government are withdrawing the £4 million which is necessary for the conduct of the postal ballot introduced by a Tory Government, they are proposing to spend £1·5 million of taxpayers' money on the ludicrous commissioner for the protection against unlawful industrial action? The House has never proposed to spend money on a more stupid and ludicrous proposal. The Government would rather fund fruitless litigation than promote democratic behaviour in the trade unions.

I believe, as do many of my hon. Friends—clearly, Conservative Members also believe this—that the Government's actions are aimed more at the next round of political fund ballots in the near future. The proposal is a naked and partisan use of legislative power to further their own perceived political interests. I wonder whether the Government's real hope is that the unions will not conduct the next round of due ballots and that their political funds will expire. Clearly, that would be to the political advantage of the Conservative Party.

In conclusion, this is not a sensible or desirable path for the House to follow, and we should reject the Government's proposals out of hand.

11.15 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): At least the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) addressed the issue that we are debating tonight. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) did not do so. Indeed, he made a disgraceful speech which I am sure, on reflection, he will wish in the morning that he had not made. I do not propose to respond to some of the matters that he raised because they are not matters for this debate.

Listening to the hon. Members for Barrow and Furness and for Holborn and St. Pancras and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), one might be forgiven for thinking that this scheme was one of the Labour party's most cherished initiatives from the 1970s—a piece of benevolence for which the trade unions are indebted to the Labour Party. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said, it is hard to believe that this is the same party whose members objected so violently to the introduction of the scheme in 1980.

On hearing tonight's reaction to the phasing out of the scheme, one might imagine that at the very least we received the support and gratitude of the Opposition when it was introduced. Far from it. The hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) explained what he said in 1979. He replied to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) by saying that, when he said that there was no need for this public funding, that reflected the fact that the trade union movement was larger and more able to pay its costs in 1979.

There is another quote from the same debate, from the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth:

"There is no case for the use of public money for this purpose. There is no demand from trade unions that such money should be used for the purpose. There is no public demand for spending public money in such a way."—[Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 123.]

I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Norman Hogg: I am glad that the Minister reads my speeches. Rumour has it that he only ever reads the works of Adam Smith. At least this represents an improvement in his reading.

The point I made in 1979 remains valid. The trade union movement had an independence born of its strength in 1979 which does not now exist. The Minister is making a case for withdrawing this funding—[Interruption.] I am sorry that those on the Government Front Bench are getting excited. They should remain calm.

The Minister is saying that this funding should be withdrawn at a time when the trade union movement is much smaller than it was in 1979. That exposes what the Government are doing, which is turning the screw harder on the trade union movement. Any attempt to pretend that these ballots were introduced in a spirit of good will to the trade union movement is a lie.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is arguing that the trade union movement is now a lame duck and should therefore have a public subsidy. What the hon. Gentleman said in 1979 was that there was no case for public money being used in this way—as well as the quote which was drawn to the attention of the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham.

The Trades Union Congress cannot be described as anything other than a late convert to the scheme—if, indeed, it has ever been converted at all. Its policy was, as stated in its 1982 conference report, that "Affiliated unions shall observe Congress policy and not seek or accept public funds for union ballots under the Employment Act 1980 ballot funds scheme."

At least until 1986, the TUC was openly hostile to the scheme and tried to punish any unions which had the temerity to make use of it. The engineers union and the electricians union learned this to their cost, as they came perilously close to expulsion from the TUC for doing so. That is hardly a ringing endorsement.

The TUC has continued to fudge the issue. Despite all that we have heard tonight, the TUC has never endorsed the scheme—never, that is, until its vociferous protests after we announced that the scheme was to be brought to an end. We have all heard of deathbed conversions, but surely someone on the Labour Benches should have advised the TUC that these are supposed to come before and not after the moment at which death has been pronounced.

Many taxpayers would, I am sure, find it extraordinary to learn that part of their taxes is spent paying private organisations to comply with what are now, for the most part, the requirements of the law. I say to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras that to understand why their money has been spent in this was we need to go back to 1980, when the scheme was established, and when the principle of industrial democracy in British trade unions was, to say the least, in its infancy. Postal balloting of trade union members was almost unheard of in 1980. Secret workplace ballots were not much more common.

The norm was that union business—including the all too frequent calls to strike and to take other industrial action—was carried out by a show of hands in the workplace car park, under the meaningful gaze of shope stewards and the more militant union members. That was the context in which the ballot funding scheme was established. Its purpose was to encourage trade unions to adopt postal balloting at a time when this was very much the exception rather than the rule. The Government made no secret at the time of their wish to see much wider use of postal ballots for important trade union decisions. The Opposition and the trade union bosses opposed this. I doubt whether many ordinary trade union members would endorse such a stance now.

I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham that the scheme was never intended to last for ever, and we never said that it would. During the 1980s the law was radically changed. Progressively and, it has to be said, in the clear absence of any willingness on the part of the trade unions to put their own house in order, the law gave union members the right to a postal ballot for electing their leaders and a secret ballot before they could be called out on strike.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend is putting me in a slight dilemma, because during my year and a quarter as a Minister in the Department of Employment no one once suggested that the scheme was temporary. I put it to him that the regulation would go down slightly more easily if he said that he intended one way or another to continue funding the trade union education and health and safety work, which is also to be cut off. None of his arguments would apply.

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend, as he told the House, is a member of the Transport and General Workers Union, which receives a quarter of the £4 million which has been provided under the ballot scheme, so I understand his concern. The trade union education and training grant is a separate matter. We have already said that we shall make additional funds available to the Health and Safety Executive to provide for training on health and safety.

The truth of the matter is that most trade unions refused to touch the ballot funding scheme so long as the law allowed them to deny their members a secret ballot. They only became interested in the scheme—and then only some of them, and only in the teeth of TUC opposition—when the law compelled them to acknowledge that their members had a right to vote in secret to elect their leaders and before strikes. In 1985, 26 unions made applications, most of them not unions affiliated to the TUC. In 1992, applications were made by 80 unions. Like that of the Labour party, the attitude of the trade unions to the scheme has been a monument of inconsistency.

The issue comes down to the proper use of significant amounts of public money—taxpayers' money. In 1981 the ballot funding scheme cost £13,000. Today it costs £4·2 million. The House must ask itself whether that is the most effective use of public money in the current circumstances.

A total of £4·2 million is enough to pay for almost 3,500 cataract operations, or more than 1,000 hip replacements. The Opposition clearly find this of no interest, but I wonder whether, when people come to their surgeries asking about waiting time in hospitals, they will say that they prefer the money to go on a trade union ballot scheme. I am sure that I know where, given the chance to make a choice, the taxpayer would prefer his money to go—and it is not on buying stamps and stationery to help trade unions to hold ballots on matters such as strikes. The Opposition have argued——

Mr. Dobson: As the Chancellor is here, and as he was Chief Secretary to the Treasury at the time the deal was done, will the Minister ask him to confirm that the cost to the taxpayer of the deal not to tax rich people from abroad who are domiciled here was about 60 times more than the amount spent on these ballots?

Mr. Forsyth: I understand why the hon. Gentleman has spent the entire evening trying to avoid the arguments on this matter, and to change the subject to other matters. Until tonight, I had never known an Opposition spokesman who put down a prayer and then refused to address the reasons behind his prayer.

The hon. Gentleman has argued that the decision to phase out the ballot funding scheme is an attack on trade unions and that it will place an unreasonable financial burden on trade unions. I am totally unconvinced by the argument that trade unions will be unable to afford to comply with the law when the ballot funding scheme is phased out. After all, some trade unions have never used the scheme at all and continue not to do so. The National Association of Local Government Officers, with its 760,000 members, has never made a claim under the scheme, and neither has the Graphic, Media and Printing Union or its antecedents.

The unions which formed the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, which sponsors the hon. Member for Holborn and St Pancras, might seem to many to typify the TUC's schizophrenic behaviour on this whole question. It was formed out of the National Union of Seamen, which made claims under the scheme, and the National Union of Railwaymen, which resolutely refused to do so. The merger of the unions led to even greater schzophrenia, with a claim made under the scheme despite a conference vote not to accept Government money for ballots. Current RMT policy, as the hon. Member for Holborn and St Pancras—who is desperately trying not to look as though he is listening to the argument—knows, is anyone's guess. It would be interesting to have the hon. Gentleman's views on whether his union is still all at sea or off the rails on this issue.

I have already referred to the gross assets of the TGWU. The certification officer records that, at the end of 1990, the gross assets of the 300 or so trade unions amounted to no less than £777 million. Against that background, the argument that unions will face financial ruin because of the phasing out of some £4 million of Government subsidy—or that this ought to represent a priority claim on scarce public resources—is wholly unsustainable. I simply cannot accept that trade unions will be unable to cope without this subsidy.

It is a dangerous and fundamentally flawed argument, which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Holborn and St Pancras put, to suggest that because the law requires an organisation or an individual to act in a certain manner there should be a public subsidy to enable those affected to meet any costs which might arise from the requirements of the law. Because Parliament decides that seat belts should be compulsory in the rear seats of cars, the Government do not offer subsidies to car manufacturers or individual car owners to fit the belts. That would not be a proper use of taxpayers' money —nor is it any longer a proper use of taxpayers' money to subsidise trade union ballots.

The bottom line is this: trade unions have obligations which exist because they continue to enjoy privileges under the law. For unions to ensure that they comply with those obligations, it is not for the taxpayer to provide them with the resources to enable them to do so.

The trade union ballot funding scheme is a scheme whose time has passed. It was established to accomplish a particular purpose: to encourage trade unions to make postal balloting the rule rather than the exception. That encouragement is no longer needed. Trade union members are now balloted by post on numerous issues, and have a legal right to vote by post on the most important of these. The original purpose of the scheme has been fulfilled and there is no case for continuing this subsidy at the taxpayer's expense. It is right that it should be phased out, and I urge the House to reject the Opposition motion.

PETITION

Channel Tunnel Link

11.41 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I wish to present a petition which has been signed by 10,000 residents of the London borough of Hackney, protesting at the choice by British Railways Board of the eastern route for the channel tunnel link because it will go through the centre of Hackney and threaten the environment and local jobs:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House instruct British Rail to abandon all plans to route a Channel Tunnel high speed rail link across the Borough of Hackney.

To lie upon the Table.

Missing Persons

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. MacKay.]

11.42 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I am pleased that I have been given the opportunity to air on the Floor of the House the vexed question of missing persons in the United Kingdom.

I make no apology for asking the Minister to consider the debate first from a personal and emotional viewpoint. I ask him to consider the anxiety of my now deceased constituent, Janette Hamilton, of Falkirk, when her 14-year-old daughter Vicki failed to return home from a weekend trip to visit her sister Sharon in Livingston, Scotland on 10 February 1990. I ask him to contemplate the growing despair as the police diligently pieced together Vicki's movements: from Livingston to Bathgate, West Lothian; from the bus station to a fish and chip shop in Bathgate; and from the fish and chip shop to where?

More than two years on, no one has been able to unravel the mystery. No one has ever been able to enter the labyrinth into which more and more young people are disappearing and to answer the question, "What happened to Vicki Hamilton?"

Will the Minister ponder the overwhelming despair that engulfed Vicki's mother as the days grew to weeks, then to months and then stretched beyond a year? If he can do so, he will realise why I speak here tonight, and hopefully it will help him to frame his reply.

In July 1992 Janette Hamilton was a broken woman when she approached me for help in persuading the Government to do more to trace missing children like her daughter Vicki. She also wanted Government help for the counselling and support for those who are left behind and who wrack their brains for clues and warning signs that they may have missed. They pray and hope that there is some sign to show that their child is still out there.

The final help for which Janette Hamilton asked was that I should tell the nation through debates such as tonight's that she believed that her daughter was still alive in the hope that the media in England and Wales would display one more photograph of her daughter with the simple message, "If Vicki is out there or anyone knows what happened to her—get in touch." I record that message unashamedly as, sadly, Janette Hamilton died on 12 January 1993, never knowing what happened to her daughter. One year and 11 months after Vicki's disappearance, Janette Hamilton was a broken woman. In the words of Vicki's sister, Sharon, Janette died of a broken heart.

The Government know that the scale of the problem is not measured in ones—tragic though each case may be. The 1988 report of the Association of Chief Police Officers, entitled, "Working Party on Missing Persons", shows that there have been three missing person cases unsolved from my region of central Scotland since before 1988. There were 60 unsolved cases from Scotland. The report recorded 1,642 persons missing for 28 days or more in the United Kingdom in 1998. There have been 2,678 unsolved missing persons cases on record since before 1988. That is the last such report that I have been able to find. It appears that such statistics are not easily collated or found.

The number of instances of missing children in the United Kingdom was estimated by the Children's Society —after conducting a survey of all chief police officers in 1988—as 98,000 incidents each year. In 1992, the survey of the National Children's Home estimated that there had been 100,000 incidents of missing children, involving 443,000 different children under 18 in England and Wales, and under 16 in Scotland.

My investigation and correspondence since July 1992 revealed, first, that the Government gave no financial assistance to provide counselling for missing persons' relatives such as Vicki Hamilton's mother. In a letter of 24 August 1992, Earl Ferrers, for the Home Office, said that he recogised that to my constituent.

"the Suzy Lamplugh Trust has been able to offer comfort and support"

Surely the 2,678 families of the untraced missing persons since 1988 deserve some support through grant assistance to allow a development of the missing persons bureau and the Suzy Lamplugh trust. Surely an amendment to the social work legislation should be considered if direct funding is denied. That would at least allow local concerns to be turned into local support for such worthwhile organisations.

The greatest deficiency that my investigations have discovered is the lack of success in establishing a national computerised database of missing persons. That was first agreed by the United Kingdom Government when they adopted the Council of Europe recommendation R79(6) in April 1979. The crime committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers submitted a report early in 1989 to the Home Office, recommending such a database. In the House of Lords on 6 November 1989, Earl Ferrers said that the Government were discussing such a database with the Metropolitan police.

Early-day motion 1159, calling for such a database, was tabled on 26 June 1990 in the House of Commons, and signed by 219 Members. On 5 July 1990, the then Home Office Minister replied to a parliamentary question that the Home Secretary

"hopes to announce his conclusion shortly."—[Official Report, 5 July 1990; Vol. 175, c. 640.]

On 12 July 1990, the then Minister said:

"We intend to introduce such a register."—[Official Report, 12 July 1990; Vol. 176, c. 444.]

It is now 23 March 1993. Earl Ferrers once again pledged the Government to introducing such a database in a letter to me on 21 August 1992.

The SO5 procedure—the card index system held by the Metropolitan police—is clearly inadequate for the task of tracing missing persons, particularly young people. The procedure used by police forces to notify and seek information on missing persons is, to say the least, less than uniform. In many cases, it is totally inadequate.

In a debate in another place on 6 July 1992, Earl Ferrers said:

"It is unlikely to be done before 1995."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 July 1992; Vol. 538, c. 1050.]

I have also received reports of a meeting between Earl Ferrers and other interested organisations that was held in November 1992, in which he stated that there were further delays in upgrading of the national police computer 2, which would carry such a database. Does that mean further delays beyond 1995?

I hope that tonight the Minister will show that the Government understand the need for action. I ask that they commit the resources needed to move forward the database development much faster than the planned completion date of 1995. I also ask the Minister seriously to consider how the Government might better support those who appear to be voluntarily counselling the relatives of missing persons. That should be the responsibility of the Government in a truly caring society. I look forward to being given some reassurances for the relatives of Vicki and of other missing people.

11.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) on obtaining this debate and on raising the complex and sensitive issue of missing persons. I share his feelings about the tragedy of Vicki Hamilton and about the terrible anguish that her mother must have suffered in the months leading up to her tragic death at the beginning of the year.

The subject of missing persons has, in recent years, aroused considerable and justified public concern, and I am grateful for an opportunity to describe some of the initiatives which the Government are currently pursuing to address it. I am thinking in particular of the development of a national computerised register of missing persons.

The police service is invariably the first agency to which the family of a missing person will turn, whether or not there is reason to believe that his or her disappearance is linked to the commission of a criminal offence. The speed, efficiency and professionalism which characterise the police's response to missing persons inquiries, particularly the mercifully few criminal abductions which they are called upon to investigate, are familiar to the House. The overwhelming majority of people are found, safe, well and usually fairly close to home, within about 48 hours of their having been reported missing.

Impressive though this record is, it has to be said that the existing arrangements for recording missing persons afford the police only limited support in their efforts to trace and identify those who have disappeared from home. Responsibility for investigating reports of missing persons is an operational one for chief officers of police. Records of missing persons are held locally and may be circulated to other forces, or to the Metropolitan police's missing persons bureau at New Scotland Yard—it offers a goodwill service to provincial forces—as chief officers consider necessary, but there are no nationally agreed standards for referral between forces or to the bureau.

This lack of comprehensive, centrally held data on missing persons may mean that a person or body recovered in one part of the country is not readily identified as someone who has been reported missing to the police elsewhere in the country. The additional distress which this delay and uncertainty may cause to anxious relatives can be easily imagined, although a tragic discovery will mark the conclusion of only a very small proportion of missing persons investigations.

At the moment, the police national computer—the PNC—holds details of missing persons, including those under 18 and adults who have disappeared in circumstances which indicate that they may have come to some harm. During the course of the year, the details of some 120,000 missing persons are entered on to the PNC, although at any one time only about 2,500 records are actually held on the system.

A major drawback of the current PNC application is that the records stored on it are retrievable by the police only on the basis of a name—which, as I have said, is obviously not much help when they have an unidentified body on their hands. Very little detailed information is currently held which might give the police some lead in tracing a missing person.

Progress is being made, however. I am pleased to report that there are at the moment some encouraging trials taking place of a new facility to retrieve records from the national file on the basis of descriptive detail. This has already been used in two operational inquiries. There is scope to make it more flexible. Under the present system only batch processing is possible, and the system will not allow the descriptive details to be modified once a search has begun. However, it is clearly a useful tool and a real step forward in streamlining police procedures. I hope that the facility will shortly become available on the PNC.

A separate initiative, using the data from the PNC, has recently been undertaken by the North Yorkshire constabulary, who may be able to offer support to other forces who are attempting to trace missing persons or identify bodies. All that adds up to increased efficiency —making the job of the police easier and, in some cases at least, easing the anxiety of relatives and friends of missing persons.

The development of a much more sophisticated missing persons application is one of a number of proposals that the police have submitted to improve the range of services that the PNC provides. The proposed application would be designed to hold more information, so that police could search across a wide range of descriptive fields—such as hair and eye colour, or clothing—and the facility would allow the retention of records for the purpose of further analysis.

The data protection registrar has agreed that records can remain on the system even though the subject may subsequently have returned home. That is because it is regrettably the case that some children run away from home or care on more than one occasion. Access to the history of previous incidents could be extremely valuable to the police in the event of that child going missing again.

However, there is still some way to go before we introduce the more sophisticated national missing persons register. The priorities identified by the police themselves are of fundamental importance in dictating which new services should have first call on resources. I have to say that the police have said that they look to the PNC to meet other, more pressing needs before an enhanced missing persons application can be brought on stream. They have shown their preference to have the national criminal record system completed, the police national network implemented, a national automatic fingerprint identification system developed, a system built to assist them in handling major disasters such as the tragedy with the Zeebrugge ferry, as well as a development to provide the police officer making a roadside vehicle check with more information about the driver of the vehicle.

The combined effect of accommodating those competing priorities is that the new missing persons facility is unlikely to become available until 1995 at the earliest, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged.

The Government are aware that the delay in providing a national database has been a disappointment to a number of organisations that have campaigned vigorously and persuasively over a number of years for the introduction of nationally standardised procedures for reporting and recording missing persons.

[Mr. Charles Wardle]

For that reason, we have been looking very carefully at how, in the meantime, we might improve the way in which the existing regime operates. We have been talking to the police about ways in which they might be able to make more effective and co-ordinated use of the facilities that are at present available to them, so that we might bring about some worthwhile improvements to procedures in the short term. I hope that we shall shortly be in a position to announce our plans for promoting a more standardised approach to the problem of missing persons, which will provide useful interim progress until the enhanced computerised register is serviceable and on stream.

The hon. Gentleman will doubtless be aware that the police in Scotland have set up a national index of persons who have been missing for more than one month. The index is held centrally on computer at the Scottish Criminal Record Office and can be accessed by all Scottish police forces. A correspondingly entry is also made on the PNC. The Scottish index is overseen by the Scottish Criminal Records Office, which operates a reminder system, so that forces are advised at regular intervals of those persons in their areas who are registered as missing on the computer.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the important work done by the National Children's Home. That research has prompted us to consider whether existing arrangements are sufficiently sensitive to pick up less immediately obvious warning signals, which may show that something is seriously wrong in the life of a child, that he or she may be the target of hitherto unsuspected abuse, of whatever type or degree, or other criminal behaviour.

Home Office officials are consulting their colleagues in other Government Departments on proposals for developing a strategy that will ensure that the needs and problems of returned runaways are properly identified and, where appropriate, drawn to the attention of the relevant statutory authorities to initiate whatever remedial action is judged to be necessary.

I referred earlier to the representations which the Government have received in recent years from groups and individuals who maintain a special interest in missing persons. None has been more active or committed in this respect than the Suzy Lamplugh Trust, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. My right hon. and learned Friend and I greatly value the trust's continuing work on behalf of missing persons and those they leave behind who, I know, are often beset by overwhelming feelings of helplessness and isolation.

The trust's application to the Home Office for funds for the missing persons helpline, which it operated until the middle of last year, received careful consideration, but, the Department's commitment to improving police procedures for dealing with missing persons precluded the provision of financial assistance to the helpline. Helping people to avoid becoming the victims of violence is a primary aim of our crime prevention effort, and the Suzy Lamplugh trust's contribution towards that aim is significant and welcome.

Support for those people who do become victims of crime is central to the Government's policy on law and order, and has led to the development of a range of services to meet their needs. The victims charter, which was published in 1990, describes the level of service which victims of crime should expect from the criminal justice agencies. We liaise regularly with those agencies to encourage compliance with the aims and provisions of the charter.

There are also, of course, the local victim support schemes, some 380 of them across England and Wales, covering 97 per cent. of the population, whose 8,000 volunteer visitors provide emotional help and practical assistance for about 750,000 victims of crime a year, including 130,000 victims of rape and other crimes of violence. There is a similar organisation in Scotland—as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), will confirm—which is receiving a grant of more than £640,000 from the Scottish Home and Health Department in the current year.

Local scheme workers or volunteers contact all victims of crime referred by the police in their own homes. Contact is made by letter, telephone or a personal visit. Workers provide emotional support, a sympathetic ear and practical help, such as assisting with criminal injuries or other claims forms, advising on housing difficulties, accompanying victims to court and, if necessary, referring them to other sources of more specialised, long-term help.

The Government fund the national charity Victim Suppport generously. We are providing £7·3 million this year and £8·4 million next year—a 15 per cent. increase. In addition to local victim support services those funds also help to provide more than 30 Crown court witness schemes to support witnesses in the more serious, and inevitably more traumatic, criminal trials. Victim Support offers its services not only to the immediate victim, but to relatives and friends, who are, of course, the indirect victims of crimes.

I hope that what I have said this evening demonstrates the Government's commitment to making progress in the difficult area of missing persons. As I said at the outset, it is a problem which throws up a number of sensitive issues. Although the police are invariably unstinting in their efforts to recover vulnerable missing persons, or those whose disappearance suggests that they may be at risk of harm, not everyone who goes missing will fall into those categories; nor will the circumstances of their departure be at all straightforward.

The problem of missing persons is a deeply complex one which, if its causes are to be understood and effectively addressed, must draw to it the collective efforts and expertise of all the statutory and voluntary organisations which share a responsibility for the welfare of those members of our society. It will never be enough simply to identify symptoms here and there, and then to treat them selectively and in isolation.

The value of sensitive and informed inter-agency co-operation has been increasingly recognised in recent years, and is now brought to bear on a range of difficult social problems which need to be tackled on a number of fronts. For example, joint working procedures are now mandatory in child protection cases, and are encouraged in other areas, such as domestic violence. I have no doubt that only by harnessing this spirit of co-operation and sharing of information shall we succeed in finding a way through the difficult and disturbing area of missing persons. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the tragic lesson of Vicki Hamilton will not be lost as progress is sought.

What is clear is that we must direct all our energies and resources toward protecting the vulnerable members of our society from those who would harm and exploit them. I hope that the most important end will be materially served by our plans to refine and rationalise procedures for recording and tracing vulnerable missing persons.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes past Twelve midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Policy

1. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on his plans for future initiatives on urban policy.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Michael Howard): We will continue to support the regeneration of our cities through encouraging private investment and using public resources effectively. That is why I announced today my proposals for promoting growth along the east Thames corridor, which will be of great benefit to Lewisham and south-east London.

Mr. Dowd: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. It will go down very thinly in Lewisham because of the damage caused by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement in November. Does he recall that it was his Department which asked the London borough of Lewisham to prepare bids for the urban programme last year, that that was done at a cost of many tens of thousands of pounds and that his November statement rendered the exercise completely worthless? Despite his assurance that the money would not be wasted because the borough could apply for urban partnership, not one penny piece has come to Lewisham, with the net result that 1,500 jobs and training places have been lost. Are not his assurances about the urban programme completely worthless, in accordance with the Government's statement on taxation, and does not he continue to do immense damage to the prospects of the people of Lewisham and urban areas generally across the country?

Mr. Howard: Urban partnership, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, is a competitive programme and Lewisham was not successful in that competition. However, it was successful in the competition for city challenge, which is a far bigger programme and from which the borough of Lewisham is receiving £37·5 million over five years. That is attracting larger sums of private sector investment. It is absolutely disgraceful for the hon. Gentleman to ask a question about resources in Lewisham without mentioning city challenge. We are accustomed to Opposition Members selling the country short. The hon. Gentleman is selling his own borough short.

Mr. Alan Howarth: May I encourage the Government to retain the city challenge programme? Even if the precise expenditure under the programme in future years cannot at this stage be determined, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Government intend to build on the achievements of city challenge in mobilising the varied resources of inner-city communities in a new and constructive spirit of partnership?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. City challenge has revolutionised the approach to partnership between central Government and local authorities by escaping from the dead hand of routine and encouraging authorities to examine from scratch the way in which resources can be most effectively deployed. I shall certainly take my hon. Friend's remarks into account in considering how we are to take the programme further.

Mr. Mackinlay: Does the Secretary of State accept that it is a gross discourtesy to the House and to hon. Members who represent Kent, Essex and east London constituencies that he has not made a full statement to the House about the east Thames corridor instead of announcing it at a press conference this morning? Will he also note that while the east Thames corridor documents trail an expansion of housebuilding in the east which, of course, is welcome, the problem is not a shortage of planning permission for housing development in east London, but a shortage of customers and the inability of local authorities to once more build homes for families?

Mr. Howard: I certainly do not accept that there was any discourtesy. It is not customary to make oral statements to the House on planning guidance of that kind. I took steps to ensure that hon. Members, including the hon. Gentleman, knew in advance that the documents would be available in the Library this morning at precisely the same time as I gave my press conference, because I was anxious for hon. Members to be fully informed. The hon. Gentleman spoke about customers for houses. We know that the Labour party does not look any further than its nose, but the purpose of the guidance that I issued this morning was to plan for the future and for recovery. That is exactly what we shall do.

Mrs. Gorman: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his announcement today of the task force to examine developments in the Thames corridor, which will be most welcome to my constituents. Housing developments throughout my constituency have restarted, so, when I cast my eyes around, I see that there is obviously regrowth and regeneration in the economy. We have many thriving industries in the docks, in Shell and at Ford Dagenham which are only seeking the opportunity for redevelopment. That will come with the kind of interest that my right hon. and learned Friend is taking in our part of the world.

Mr. Howard: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's acute powers of observation, for which she is renowned. Using those acute powers, my hon. Friend has seen evidence of recovery all around her and her constituents. Those signs will become increasingly apparent over the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Vaz: Why does not the Secretary of State have the courage to admit that if his future initiatives, including that which he announced today, are anything like his past urban policy initiative they will be a complete disaster? Have not the Government learnt the lessons of docklands? Given the Government's humiliating defeat in the vote on the Committee of the Regions, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bow to democracy and give the House an assurance that people in the east London corridor and in inner-city areas will be properly represented on any bodies, structures or organisations which the right hon. and learned Gentleman creates through their democratically elected local councillors, not through the Secretary of State's stooges and puppets?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman had taken trouble to study the announcement that I made this morning, he would know that the whole purpose of the task force that I have established in the east Thames corridor is to work together with the area's 16 local authorities, to help them to co-ordinate their efforts and to put in place the framework necessary to make sure, for the benefit of the people in the area, that we take the greatest advantage of the opportunities that the area has to offer. I am confident that, in time, we shall all benefit from the results of that exercise.

House Building

2. Mr. Milligan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses will be provided in Hampshire as a result of the measures announced in the autumn statement.

The Minister for Housing, Planning and Construction (Sir George Young): Housing associations will purchase some 18,000 additional homes in England using the £577 million allocated for that purpose in the autumn statement. That is a very great achievement, exceeding by 2,000 the target of 16,000 homes set in November. I congratulate heartily the Housing Corporation and the 80 associations involved. Purchases have been widely spread across the country, with acquisitions in some 97 per cent. of local authority areas. More than 800 of those new homes will be in Hampshire. We hope that grants to local authority and housing association tenants will enable some 3,500 to become owner-occupiers, freeing their current homes for those in need. Latest estimates suggest that more than 200 may be in Hampshire. Overall, well over 20,000 families in England will benefit from permanent new homes.

Mr. Milligan: Is my hon. Friend aware that Swaythling housing association believes that his measures will house 2,500 people in Hampshire this year? In my constituency, the number of people in temporary accommodation has halved in the past three months as a direct result of my hon. Friend's measures. In addition, extra Government aid has enabled my council to increase by one fifth the money spent on housing development, and proposed rent rises have been halved as a result of Government aid. Is not that proof positive that, despite the Opposition's claims, the Government are implementing practical measures to help the homeless and those in council accommodation?

Sir George Young: The House will take heart from the encouraging news from my hon. Friend's constituency, which is replicated throughout the country. The number of families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has fallen 38 per cent. over the past 12 months and that is a substantial achievement. In Hampshire, the Housing Corporation has approved allocations for projects next year totalling almost £29 million. We are determined to maintain the momentum and to continue to make progress on all housing fronts.

Mr. Denham: Does the Minister accept that short-term measures, however welcome—and I welcome every additional home for rent—will not tackle the fundamental housing problem? Does he accept that the Government were responsible for a fall in the number of new homes to rent in Hampshire from 1,000 in 1988 to 462 in 1991? In the most recent year, well over 3,000 households in Hampshire became homeless. Existing measures must be expanded and sustained at a much higher level if homelessness is to be eradicated. What assurances can the Minister give the House that the type of measures taken will not be a flash in the pan, but will be expanded and sustained in future years?

Sir George Young: On the question of expansion, the output of housing associations is forecast to rise from 27,000 units in 1991-92 to more than 65,000 this year. That is a substantial improvement. As for homelessness, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take comfort from the fact that, over the past 12 months, the number of people accepted as homeless by local authorities has fallen by 2 per cent. It is the first time in 17 years that we have seen a reduction in homeless acceptances.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that there are good signs on the horizon and that the rather gloomy picture that he has painted does not represent what is really happening.

Mr. Malone: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the measures that his Department announced today about Hampshire's structure plans should be viewed along with the measures announced in the autumn statement, as they will have an equally significant effect on housing in Hampshire? Will he note that there is great relief in Hampshire following the news that no new settlement is to be imposed as a means of creating additional housing in the county and will he accept the thanks of the county council?

Sir George Young: I can confirm that the announcement made today by my right hon. and learned Friend, announcing regional guidance for Hampshire, makes it clear that a new settlement will not be required during the plan period to 2001. I note that that news has been accepted with relief by my hon. Friend's constituents.

Mr. Battle: Is the Minister aware that, as a result of the Government's proposed reduction in housing association grant rates to 55 per cent.—announced in the autumn statement and since—rents are set to rise to more than 39 per cent. of tenants' incomes? Is he aware that the number of housing association tenants on housing benefit will rise to 89 per cent. by 1996? According to UBS Phillips and Drew, pensioners in Hampshire, Shropshire and Hereford will find that they have to spend 61 per cent. of their incomes on rent. Will not that totally undermine any common-sense understanding of the Government's declared intention of providing affordable housing through the housing associations—or will the Minister reassure us that those huge rent increases will be met by massive housing benefit increases?

Sir George Young: I reject the alarmist propaganda that the hon. Gentleman has just revealed to the House. He knows perfectly well that no decisions on grant rates for 1994-95 have been made; when they are made, we shall bear in mind the important question of affordability.

Grant rates for the coming year have indeed been reduced, from 72 to 67 per cent., but, because of falling interest rates, lower land values and more competitive tenders, that will have no significant impact on rents. It will enable us to produce 3,300 more units, which is precisely what the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) advocated.

Mr. Colvin: How many more homes might have been provided in Hampshire if the Budget had done more to assist the private rented sector? If my constituency is anything to go by, there are about 10,000 empty dwellings in the county. I acknowledge the importance of building new houses, both for owner-occupation and to rent, but is not it equally important to make use of the private rented sector when so many dwellings are empty?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Those 10,000 empty units represent a resource which must be returned to use. My right hon. and learned Friend and I are examining proposals to revive the private rented sector further and to restore incentives for property owners to make their accommodation available for rent, so that we can make more progress in tackling the housing problems in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Water Quality (Bassenthwaite)

3. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral answer of 27 January, Official Report, column 1029, what further developments have taken place in respect of management of water quality in Bassenthwaite.

The Minister for the Environment and Countryside (Mr. David Maclean): I understand that the hon. Member had a useful meeting and follow-up with the National Rivers Authority. The NRA's study of water quality in Bassenthwaite is continuing and will enable the authority to establish whether improvements are required.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I also had a useful and helpful meeting with North West Water. May I have an assurance that no administrative, procedural or bureaucratic obstacles will delay whatever proposals North West Water presents with a view to sorting out the problems in Bassenthwaite?

Mr. Maclean: I, too, would deplore any unnecessary administrative or bureaucratic delays. The best way to avoid any bureaucratic delays in the future is to have this conclusive study conducted by the NRA, with which no one can disagree. If, following that study, the NRA should request North West Water to take remedial action, I would not anticipate any bureaucratic delays.

Local Authorities (Spending Levels)

4. Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to allow local authorities to determine their own spending levels.

Mr. Howard: It is for each local authority to set its own budget, taking account of all appropriate considerations, including any provisional criteria for capping which have been announced.

Mr. Byers: That is a particularly disappointing reply, even from this Secretary of State. Is he aware that, because of the severe capping regime being forced on local government, about 35,000 jobs have been lost in local councils in just the past few weeks and that, as a result, there have been deep and damaging cuts in vital local services? Does the Secretary of State agree that if there is to be the renaissance of local government promised a few weeks ago by the Prime Minister, it must entail giving local people the freedom to determine the level of local services, instead of the present interference from Whitehall?

Mr. Howard: I certainly do not accept that there have been the job losses to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He is referring to the estimates which we always hear at this time of year and which are rarely translated into practice. What clearly emerges from his question is that he and his hon. Friends are prepared to remove all constraints from local authority spending and to see it go through the roof. That is a message which we shall take to every home in the shire districts of England in the forthcoming county council election campaign.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that councils that set budgets that are indifferent to the plight of those who have to pay the council tax towards those budgets are not providing good leadership for their areas? Is not it the brutal truth that the vast majority of the local authorities that come up against the capping criteria are Labour or Labour and Liberal authorities, which are indifferent to the people who live in their area?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The attitude that the Opposition take to this question is entirely typical of their lack of concern for those who have to pay the bills.

Mr. Straw: Has not the Secretary of State seen the Audit Commission's draft report entitled "Passing the Bucks", which wholly damns his disreputable standard spending assessment system as being "neither simple . . . nor stable". It states that it does not provide a standard level of service, that SSAs are now "being used for tasks"—

such as capping—

"for which they were not originally designed", and that they are confusing accountability between central and local government. How can he justify a system which claims that the Prime Minister's Huntingdonshire is more deprived than Chester-le-Street and that Bournemouth is more deprived than Barnsley? Is not the only explanation for such perverse outcomes that he has gerrymandered the system to suit his party? Does not he understand that the credibility of the whole system can be restored only if grant allocation is taken from his partisan hands and given to an independent grant commission, reporting via the Select Committee to the House?

Mr. Howard: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to rise to confess at last that all his dire predictions about the council tax had been mistaken, that his prophecies of doom and gloom about the council tax in the past few months had been without foundation and that he had been entirely wrong.

The hon. Gentleman knows very well that we are going to undertake a fundamental review of the SSA system in time for the next settlement. I invite him and his colleagues to make representations to us in the context of that review. We know from experience that there will be as wide a variety of views expressed by members of the Labour party about what should happen as there will be from any other source.

Mr. Knapman: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that few councils want to spend more than their SSAs and that most council tax payers want to be protected from the ambitions of high-spending councils? Will he also bear in mind the fact that if Oxfordshire can be in the south-east for area cost adjustment purposes, Gloucestershire would like to be in the south-east for those purposes, too?

Mr. Howard: I understand the concern that my hon. Friend expresses on behalf of Gloucestershire and I certainly agree that people want to be protected from high-charging councils and that Conservative councils, on the whole, do not wish to spend beyond their capping limits. However, I cannot extend my agreement with my hon. Friend to cover Labour-controlled councils. If given the chance, they would undoubtedly spend beyond their capping limits and would be encouraged to do so by the Labour party, with total disregard for the interests of the people who live in those areas.

Nuclear Industry

5. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to meet environmental groups in the near future to discuss the impact on the environment of the nuclear industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: I have no such plans.

Mr. McAllion: Is the Minister aware that the President of the Board of Trade once described Magnox nuclear power stations as old and unsafe? Is he also aware that the nuclear installations inspectorate has identified serious safety problems in five Magnox stations and that there is therefore a risk of a serious accident? Will he explain to the House why he has allowed Nuclear Electric to continue to operate those stations far beyond their design life and why, in view of the serious safety problems, he has not ordered their immediate closure?

Mr. Maclean: I am also aware that we have the toughest regulatory framework in the world for our whole nuclear industry, which operates only if the independent inspectorate believes that it is safe for it to do so.

Mr. Whittingdale: Does my hon. Friend agree that nuclear power stations are the most environmentally friendly means of generating electricity and are responsible for producing virtually no greenhouse gases? Does he further agree that early closure of the Magnox nuclear power stations, such as Bradwell in my constituency, would make it more difficult for us to meet the targets set by the Rio convention?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is right. The nuclear power industry makes no contribution to our CO_2 and greenhouse gas problems—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] The authentic voice of the Labour party is emerging—it opposes nuclear power. Labour Members should talk to one or two of their hon. Friends, especially the shadow Foreign Secretary. He may put them right.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Is the Minister aware that his answer to the question reveals that the Government have no plans to discuss the White Paper after its production tomorrow until it comes to the House for a vote next week? That shows that the White Paper is meant to be a general fiddle, as well as a quick fix. The implications for the environment, energy use, employment and the economy are meant to be obscured, as the Government make a dash for safety and buy the votes of their Back Benchers. When we are asked to consider the future of the coal industry, we shall not even have the chance to consider the finances of the nuclear industry. Is not that madness, as well as a fiddle?

Mr. Skinner: So why did you vote for the Government?

Mr. Maclean: Far be it from me to suggest that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) may have made a valid point, too. Perhaps the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) should concentrate more on the facts, instead of preparing sound bites for question time.

Local Government Corruption

6. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he has taken to curb fraud and corruption in local government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): The prevention and detection of fraud and corruption is the responsibility of the members and senior management of local authorities, with the support of the auditor. Where the system has failed, the police also have a role to play. I welcome the recent announcement by the Audit Commission of a study into fraud and corruption and if the study finds that local authorities or auditors need new powers I will certainly be willing to consider its proposals.

Mr. Booth: In view of the widespread and worrying expansion of corruption, extending to places such as Hackney, where fraud worth £40 million has been reported, will the Minister tell the House whether his proposals will cover incentives and protection for the people who have the courage to expose those practices? Will his study of malpractice cover contracting out by local authorities and all that has happened in that connection under Labour local authorities?

Mr. Squire: I trust that I speak for the whole House when I say that we share my hon. Friend's concern about fraud, wherever it occurs. On my hon. Friend's serious point about the risks that may be run by whistle blowers, as I think they are called, if there is any evidence that further protection is needed I will examine it carefully. On the wider powers in respect of compulsory competitive tendering, on which there is a later question, I can assure my hon. Friend that we have significant powers at present and that we shall not hesitate to use them whenever and wherever there is any evidence of anti-competitive behaviour.

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister accept that the main cause for worry about fraud in local government emanates from the Secretary of State's office—the kind of fraud which deprives authorities such as my own borough of Sandwell of resources while showering largesse on some of the richest boroughs in the country such as Westminster and Wandsworth? Judging from his earlier reply, even the current Secretary of State is so embarrassed by the scale of fraud that he has at last—not before time—promised us a review.

Mr. Squire: The hon. Gentleman makes light of the very serious subject of fraud in local government. That is the subject of the question and I had thought, perhaps wrongly, that it was something against which the House was united. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman cheapened the argument as he did.

Council Tax

7. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that council taxpayers know the level of tax charged by each tier of local government in their area.

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): The main way in which people will learn of the different precepts set by the different constituent local authorities is through their bills. I have a sample bill which makes very clear the amounts being charged by the county and district, respectively, any discounts which apply, and finally the amount that the individual or household is required to pay. I hope that my hon. Friend's constituents will find their bills clear. They will know who has imposed the charges and—from what they read in their local papers—who is delivering the goods.

Mr. Coombs: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is a difference of £108 between what a householder in an average band C house would pay under a Labour-controlled and under a Conservative-controlled council? Needless to say, the difference is in favour of the Conservative council. Is there a lesson that my hon. Friend would like to draw to the attention of those who will be voting in the county council elections in May?

Mr. Redwood: Indeed—they will get better value for money and better services at a realistic price from Conservative councils. My hon. Friend may like to know that Thamesdown, a Labour borough, imposes a £94 band C district charge while the adjacent Conservative authority of Salisbury charges £41—notwithstanding the fact that Salisbury receives less grant than Thamesdown.

Mr. Betts: Does the Minister accept that comparisons involving the use of band D, band C or any other band are wrong? The only comparison that should be drawn is between the average council tax for whole areas. If there are two similar authorities with the same average council tax, the authority with more lower-band properties will automatically have a higher council tax for any given band. That is the truth of the matter. Generally, it is Labour authorities that have more lower-banded—that is, cheaper—properties. Is it not time that Conservative Members stopped using fiddled figures to try to justify their own inadequacy?

Mr. Redwood: The Opposition do not understand a thing about how the system works. Labour authorities that have more lower-banded properties get a lot more grant to compensate for that. Contrary to Labour Members' allegation that the fraud is that Labour authorities get too little grant, those authorities get much more grant to compensate. The correct comparison is between band D and band D and between band C and band C. On those comparisons, Conservative authorities win every time.

Mr. Pickles: Has my hon. Friend noted the trend in local government spending whereby the highest council tax in a shire, a district, a metropolitan district or a London borough is to be found in a Labour authority and the lowest council tax in a shire, a district, a metropolitan district or a London borough is to be found in a Conservative authority?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is quite right. There is Newcastle at £704 and Wellingborough at £218, Greenwich at £696 and Westminster at £262—in each case, the higher amount is charged by Labour and the lower amount by the Conservatives, even though more grant goes to the Labour authority and less to the Conservative one.

Mr. Straw: The Minister is not telling the whole story, as he well knows. Will he stop picking bands C and D to suit his case and accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) has said—that what matters to people are the bills that come through their doors? Is he not delighted to hear that the average precept in the eight Labour shire counties is running at £6 lower than the average precept in Conservative counties, and that the latest survey by the Local Government Chronicle of all 363 tax-raising councils in England shows that the average bill per household is running at £493 under Conservative councils and at £479—£14 less—under Labour councils? Is the Minister aware, therefore, that Tory claims about the council tax are as worthless as Tory claims about value added tax and that Labour councils cost less and give a great deal more?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman, speaking from the Opposition Front Bench, does not understand the system any more than his Back Benchers understand it. He is wrong on every count. Labour authorities get more grant and charge more, property for property, in the same bands. That is the relevant comparison. The hon. Gentleman is simply drawing attention to the fact that Labour authorities get more grant than Conservative authorities get.

Leasehold Enfranchisement

8. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to publicise the leasehold enfranchisement provisions of the Housing and Urban Development Bill once it receives Royal Assent; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The leasehold enfranchisement provisions have received much publicity in the press over the past few months, most of it supportive. There will, of course, be further publicity when the provisions, which will be welcomed by many hundreds of thousands of people living in flats, come into force. We are planning to publish a booklet to help leaseholders and have offered to help fund an advisory agency for up to three years.

Mr. Waterson: Does my hon. Friend accept that the 750,000 potential beneficiaries from these provisions, including many in Eastbourne, will welcome that announcement, as they will welcome the Government's redeeming of this important manifesto pledge in the teeth of opposition from Labour Members?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend will be interested to know that the Bill has left this House and is in another place, where it has provoked a lively debate but where, in the capable hands of my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the leasehold enfranchisement clauses have so far emerged unscathed.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister now give his estimate of how many leaseholders will be able to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill? I ask him because in Committee he was unable to say how many had taken advantage of the provisions of the previous legislation. Is he aware of the anxieties that have been expressed about the fact that the complexities of the current Bill are such that many leaseholders who would like to enfranchise will not be able to do so?

Sir George Young: About 750,000 leaseholders will potentially benefit from the Bill. It is entirely up to the leaseholders whether they exercise the choice that the Government are making available to them, so at the end of the day it is not the view of the Government that matters but the view of the leaseholders of the flats.

Use of Resources (Lambeth)

9. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last visited the borough of Lambeth to discuss the efficient use of resources.

Mr. Robin Squire: How an authority uses its resources is a matter for its members, who are accountable to their local electorate. The voters of Lambeth must be deeply concerned about the staggering allegations of maladministration in their council's performance, as revealed in the recent report of Lambeth's chief executive.

Mr. Bowis: Does my hon. Friend agree that the people of Lambeth cannot complain about lack of resources from the Government when each dwelling in Lambeth receives £500 more than each dwelling in Conservative Wandsworth next door, but that they can certainly complain about the level of corruption in the Labour council, as recognised now even by Streatham Labour party? Does he agree that they can also complain about the level of inefficiency which leads to uncollected rent, rates and community charge now totalling £140 million, which could and should be spent on better services at lower cost?

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend makes a powerful case. As he knows, the standard spending assessment methodology is applied consistently across all local authorities in the country, and as a consequence of that methodology Lambeth receives a very high SSA, although it may not do so if Opposition Members get their way. My hon. Friend also points out that, despite that support, in the year just ended Lambeth managed to set the highest community charge of all, at £425.

Mr. Fraser: I congratulate the Minister for Housing, Planning and Construction, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), on coming to Lambeth this week to discuss the efficient allocation of resources and the city challenge scheme. I hope that the example that he set of co-operation with local authorities will be followed by some of his fellow Ministers.

Mr. Squire: The best evidence for co-operation between the Government and Lambeth is that Lambeth council was one of the winners of city challenge on merit and, subject to the usual procedures, will receive some £37·5 million over the next five years for much-needed work. That is the most effective answer to the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Dickens: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Lambeth they are still doing the Lambeth walk with £20 million worth of rent arrears and £18·2 million of rate arrears? What the hell are Lambeth councillors up to? Why should they ask the Government for more money when they do not get down to doing the job themselves?

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend makes most eloquently the point about the failings of Lambeth council over many years. The House will be relieved that he did not go into a dance to demonstrate it.

Mr. Keith Hill: Can the Minister confirm that the London borough of Lambeth is co-operating fully with the police and the Audit Commission in all their investigations, and will he join me in welcoming the public inquiry established under Elizabeth Appleby QC? Can he confirm that the minority Labour administration's correct proposal to close down immediately the directorate most affected by the allegations was scandalously defeated by an unholy alliance of suspended and Conservative councillors?

Mr. Squire: The most important development recently in Lambeth has been a statement from the hon. Gentleman issued by the Streatham branch of the Labour party in which the hon. Gentleman, with considerable support, called for the immediate retendering of building maintenance contracts and for Lambeth council's huge finance and legal services departments to be put out to tender. I ask the hon. Gentleman, first, to persuade all the local Labour councillors to back that and, secondly, to get his own Front Bench to agree with it.

Sir Paul Beresford: Is my hon. Friend aware that the mismanagement of Lambeth council has knock-on effects which go well beyond Lambeth? In my constituency, for example, children from Lambeth who are in care are being looked after in private care homes in Croydon. The lack of speed of payments from Lambeth council is such that many of those homes are now in extreme difficulty. The payments are not coming forth from Lambeth council.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. There are knock-on effects which go beyond the boundaries of Lambeth. It is in all our interests that Lambeth councillors organise themselves more properly in the next five years than they have in the past 10 years.

Mr. Henderson: When the Minister visited Lambeth last week, did he discuss the use of resources in the building management south east division of the Property Services Agency and the allegations of fraud and malpractice, including false payments to bogus companies, misuse of Government resources, tax fiddles and nepotism?

Does he agree that, at a time when he is calling for an independent inquiry into allegations of malpractice in local authorities, the public interest can be served only by an independent public inquiry into his Department's agency? Does he agree that anything less than that procedure would serve only to confirm suspicions of a ministerial cover-up and double standards? Can he tell the House that the privatisation of BMSE will be suspended until an independent inquiry publishes its findings?

Mr. Squire: The House will note that attention has shifted from local government. With regard to the Property Services Agency, hon. Members have been told that a full inquiry is under way. To date, that inquiry has not discovered any evidence of fraud, although there was a small piece of undercharged work. The allegations that the hon. Gentleman has made today, and which are repeated in a national newspaper, will be taken over by that inquiry. As none of the allegations has so far been substantiated, there is no reason on earth why there should be a delay in the sale of PSA businesses. We are confident that the sale of the five businesses will not be significantly affected.

Urban Partnership Fund

10. Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning the urban partnership fund.

Mr. Redwood: I have received several representations about the urban partnership fund. Many have welcomed the £20 million of Government cash, which the partnerships forecast will bring in another £33 million of local authority receipts and £130 million of private investment.

Mr. Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for listening to and acting on representations from my constituency in Southport, which resulted in an urban partnership fund grant of £310,000 for the redevelopment of Southport sea front. Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance today that he will find time later this year to visit Southport to ensure that the local authority spends the money as it was intended? Does he agree with me that the urban partnership fund is an outstanding success?

Mr. Redwood: Of course I agree that it is a great success. It is an example of partnership in action. It encourages local authorities to raise more money by asset sales and to use the money for the benefit of their local community. If I can fit in a visit, I should love to visit Southport. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) was in my hon. Friend's constituency only yesterday. I should love to come and see the good work. I am sure that Southport sea front will benefit a great deal and will produce another £9 million of private investment for that £310,000 Government grant.

Budget

11. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of fiscal changes announced in the Budget.

Mr. Howard: As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman owns a part share in a racehorse, so I would imagine that he would be the first to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his Budget measures. I welcome the changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget statement, which will greatly benefit the environment. It was the greenest Budget ever.

Mr. Turner: Instead of inflicting cruel damage by increasing fuel costs by 10 per cent. across the board, would it not have been better for the environment if the Chancellor had adjusted the differentials between leaded and unleaded petrol and introduced a higher rate of tax on cars with large engines than on small cars? I suggest to the Secretary of State that that would have been a much better contribution to our environment.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor introduced measures on the taxation of cars which will achieve precisely the effect to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The use of unleaded petrol does not contribute to a reduction in global warming. Therefore, increasing the differential would not have the effect that the measures that my right hon. Friend introduced will have.

Mr. Gallie: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that yesterday Britain came under attack from our EC partners for failing to endorse an EC-wide energy tax? Will he make our critics aware that our right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his recent Budget met our commitment fully by covering energy tax in the way that he has done?

Mr. Howard: I did precisely that at a meeting of the Council of Environment Ministers in Brussels on Monday. As a result of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget, we already have in place measures that take us two thirds of the way towards achieving our target under the climate change convention that we signed up to at Rio. In the next few months, we shall announce how we propose to fulfil the other third of our target.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the Secretary of State admit that the imposition of VAT on electricity and gas bills will, at the most generous estimate, reduce carbon emissions in Britain by less than 1 per cent? Is that not a pathetically small advance for the environment at the cost of massive hardship to millions of people who will now have to struggle hard to heat their homes? Is it not true that, as Greenpeace pointed out, the Budget was far more about raising money than about tackling climate change? Are not the Government pretending to be green purely and simply because their finances are in the red?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman will know that Friends of the Earth warmly welcomed the measures in my right hon. Friend's Budget. Has the hon. Gentleman forgotten that in February this year he told Green Magazine that his party had been thinking of a number of small but effective tax measures which included increasing VAT on environmentally unfriendly products? Does the hon. Gentleman think that he can get away with telling Green Magazine one thing and the House another?

Caravan Sites Act 1968

12. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): We have received more than 900 responses to our consultation paper, "Reform of the Caravan Sites Act 1968". A list of the respondents is in the Library, and copies of the responses are in the Department's library. We are considering the responses carefully and will announce the way forward as soon as possible.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is unfortunate that many of those who use gipsy sites are not gipsies, but itinerants, didicoys and ne'er-do-wells who feel that they have no obligation to society? Can we have some assurance of early legislation to repeal the Act?

Mr. Baldry: I think that there is general agreement that the Caravan Sites Act needs reform. At present, it fails gipsies and local communities. We want to ensure that the gipsies can have proper provision for sites through the planning system and that local communities are freed of the problems of illegal camping whether by gipsies or by new age travellers.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that some of the proposals in the consultation document last August that official sites should be abolished and sold off in the way suggested by some hon. Members would create more problems than it would solve? Will he undertake to consider in a positive way whether one solution that would be more acceptable to local authorities and residents, while overcoming some of the problems caused by unofficial sites, would be to consider the provision of smaller sites rather than large official sites?

Mr. Baldry: With respect, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has fully read the consultation paper. We are keen to ensure that local authority sites are properly managed. Many local authorities are not managing their sites. If gipsies are allowed to make provision for their sites through the planning system, I have no doubt that the consequence will be smaller sites.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that his proposals have widespread support, especially those which aim to stamp out the plague of illegal occupation? Is he aware that my local borough council, King's Lynn and West Norfolk, is aware that the proposals might lead to the withdrawal of 100 per cent. funding of local authority sites? Will he look again at the proposals and seek a compromise whereby there is still some Department of the Environment funding for those sites?

Mr. Baldry: There is no other parallel anywhere in the machinery of government for 100 per cent. direct grant as there is for caravan sites. There is no longer any justification for that. We have no objection to those who wish to pursue a nomadic form of life, but they should not do so at a cost to the general taxpayer and should increasingly make their own provision.

Tenants Charter

13. Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress on the tenants charter.

Mr. Baldry: There is continuing interest in the charter, mainly from tenants. More than 200,000 tenants, have already applied directly to my Department for copies of the full charter.

Dr. Wright: Is the Minister aware that tenants used to have a charter right to decide who should manage their estates? Will he confirm that that right of veto by tenants is being removed by the Government's Housing and Urban Development Bill? Does that not demonstrate the hypocrisy of a Government who pretend to be the tenant's friend, but when it comes to the choice between the rights of tenants and the Government's mania for privatisation they put dogma first and tenants last?

Mr. Baldry: If the hon. Member were to look at the Bill and its provisions, he would see that tenants have far more rights to be consulted under the Bill than they have at present and will be much more involved in the tendering process than they are at the moment. The truth is that this Government and the Conservative party have introduced the right to repair, the right to improvement, the right to manage, the right to buy and the right to be consulted. We are determined that tenants should have proper rights and effective remedies. Labour Members are concerned about that because they know that all too often Labour councils are incapable of delivering effective housing management.

Mr. Dunn: Will the Minister confirm whether, under the tenants charter, it will be possible for tenants who pay their rent regularly and on time to force incompetent councils such as Lambeth and Southwark to take action against tenants who do not?

Mr. Baldry: We are determined that standards of housing management should be driven up. Too many local authorities are lax in doing repairs and lax in collecting rents—and all too often they are Labour-controlled authorities. I invite any Opposition Member who doubts that to spend half an hour with me and walk across Westminster bridge to the China Walk estate in Lambeth, where I can introduce him to large numbers of people who have been waiting for basic repairs for some considerable time.

Mr. Alf Morris: How satisfied is the Minister with his Department's record in improving housing conditions for disabled people seeking more suitable premises?

Mr. Baldry: We have a very good record on renovation grants and on grants for disabled facilities. They have increased substantially in recent years and we will see that they continue to do so.

Rivers and Beaches

14. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the trend of investment in (a) water supply and (b) environmental measures to cleanse rivers and beaches since the Water Act 1989.

Mr. Maclean: Since privatisation, investment in water supply and the cleansing of rivers and beaches has increased dramatically. The £30,000 million investment programme in new pipework in water supply and sewerage treatment works is cleaning up our rivers, beaches and seas. It is good for the environment, good for consumers, good for the construction industry and good for jobs.

Mr. Nicholson: Those of our constituents all over the country who are paying greatly increased water charges will need to know of the value for money in the increased investment in the water and sewerage industry.

Incidentally, they will also be concerned about the burden on single-person households and share the general pressure for water metering. Is my hon. Friend aware that the consumers of South West Water, who include people in the western end of my constituency, are very resentful indeed about its high charges and the rapid increase in those charges and that their view is strongly held by my hon. Friends the Members for the area? They feel that the whole country should be responsible for the clean-up of the beaches in the south-west, which are a national asset.

Mr. Maclean: Of course I am aware of the concern of my hon. Friends in the south-west about the increase in their water charges, due to implementing various measures designed to clean up the large number of beaches in the south-west. I think that my hon. Friends will agree that if we are to continue to have a fine tourist industry in the south-west of England we need the highest possible environmental quality. We are embarked, and the water industry is embarked, on a programme there, but I also take careful note of, and am very sympathetic to, the point that in the longer term any other measures that we sign up to must have quantifiable, value-for-money results. We are keen to sign up to measures that protect the environment, but we must show that they give value for money.

Ms Short: Does the Minister agree that his attitude in boasting of the investment that is taking place is far too complacent? His duty and that of the Government is to ensure that people have safe water to drink, that our rivers are clean and that our beaches do not make children ill. We do not have the best. In 1992, the European Court of Justice found Britain guilty of failing to comply with the drinking water directive. That means that over a million people have been drinking water that damages their health, river standards have declined and many of our beaches cause ill health in children who play there. The Government must encourage more investment and less profit for the privatised water companies.

Mr. Maclean: Sometimes I am amazed at the Labour party's attempts to try to grapple with the concept of the market and delivering goods and services to people. The hon. Lady accuses us of complacency and boasting of a £30,000 million investment programme. Of course we are boasting about it—it is the biggest investment programme in this country's entire history; because of it, the quality of water in our rivers and in our seas gets better every year and we are on target to meet our investment programmes and all our water quality directives.

East Thames Corridor

3.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether you could assist a frustrated and perplexed Member. During Question Time, the Secretary of State referred lightly to the east Thames corridor, and we moved quickly on. Today, he made an important announcement about the corridor which, according to his policy document, will help to shape the region's environment and guide its development for the remainder of this century and the early years of the next.

One understands that the east Thames corridor initiative and the consultation process are important to the whole country, so it would seem to be an appropriate subject for a ministerial statement at the Dispatch Box. Ministers make some fairly insignificant and unimportant statements when they choose, but we have had no statement on a matter that everyone agrees is of great importance.

Yesterday, you, Madam Speaker, said, as reported in column 824 of Hansard, that you would consider the matter and would in due course make your views known. I wonder whether you are in a position to give us the benefit of your thoughts on the matter.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. May I reinforce my hon. Friend's point? The report on the east Thames corridor is of immense significance to more than 1 million people who live in the area and to at least 100 Members on both sides of the House. In view of that, I wonder whether you would accept that it is precisely the sort of issue on which Ministers should make their views known to the House before they make them known to the press.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that I shall be able to help the House. As the issue was raised in the Chamber last night, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, I have had an opportunity to look into the sequence of events relating to it.

A written question from the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) was answered yesterday evening, and the answer was placed in the Library in a perfectly regular way. By means of that answer the House was informed that the Government's consultation proposals for the east Thames corridor would be available in the Vote Office at 10 o'clock today, and they duly arrived. At the same time, the House was informed that general publication of the proposals would take place simultaneously.

As the House knows, occupants of the Chair have frequently stated that it is a discourtesy to the House for Governments to make available substantial information for publication in the press before it is available to hon. Members. On this occasion that is distinctly not the case. On the contrary, the written answer drew the attention of the House to the fact that information would be available in the Vote Office at the same time as it was released for publication. Whether the launch of that consultation exercise justified an oral statement to the House is entirely a matter for the Government's judgment and is not one on which the Speaker is, or will ever become, involved. I am satisfied that there has been no breach of order or discourtesy to the House—and I now intend to move on.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) rose——

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to raise a different point of order?

Mr. Denham: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I must hear it.

Mr. Denham: It is a rather similar matter.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have dealt with this subject, and I shall not take points of order on similar matters. If it is on a different subject, I shall, of course, take the hon. Gentleman's point of order.

Mr. Denham: This morning, the Secretary of State for the Environment issued a press release concerning the Hampshire county structure plan, which is an important strategic issue. So far as I have been able to establish, no attempt was made to alert me, as a Hampshire Member of Parliament, to the intention to issue the press release. At Question Time, the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Malone) made it clear that he had been made aware of the press release. Would not it be courteous for the Secretary of State to inform all Hampshire Members, and not just his hon. Friends, of such important strategic announcements?

Madam Speaker: This is a matter for the Secretary of State, but I should point out that I did call the hon. Gentleman, and was delighted to do so. I hope that, with regard to this matter, I have been as helpful as possible.

Registration of Domiciliary Care Agencies

3.35 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provisions for the registration of domiciliary care agencies; to make provisions consequential thereon; and for connected purposes.

This Bill aims to clear up an anomaly in registration and inspection procedures relating to the provision of care services. The anomaly concerns the fact that, while a person in receipt of care in a residential or nursing home has the protection of the Registered Homes Act 1984, a person in receipt of the same form of care in his own home has no similar statutory protection. The Registered Homes Act requires the registration of all establishments providing care and a named person deemed to be suitably qualified who is responsible in law for the operation of the establishment. It enables homes to be inspected by local registration and inspection units. It makes provision for the cancellation of registration and for the protection and care of residents in residential or nursing homes.

My proposed Bill would apply the principles of the Registered Homes Act to domiciliary care, requiring all agencies in the private, voluntary and public sectors to be registered and inspected by the same local registration and inspection units. The same fit-person requirement would be applied, whoever was responsible for the operation of the agency.

When the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 was passing through the House, and consideration was being given to the development of domiciliary care, this inconsistency in the law was the subject of amendments supported by hon. Members on both sides. The amendments were resisted by the then Minister of State, now the Secretary of State for Health, on behalf of the Government, on the basis that the contracting and purchasing arrangements included in the legislation offered sufficient safeguards.

Many hon. Members will be aware that, after the House debated this issue, the need for legislation to protect vulnerable people who are cared for in their own homes became even more apparent when a 66-year-old woman in a wheelchair was viciously murdered in her home by her female carer. Subsequent police inquiries revealed that the woman convicted of the murder had supplied false written references to the agency that had arranged for her to care for the disabled woman. To the agency's great credit, it has been at the forefront of subsequent campaigning for the introduction of statutory registration and inspection requirements for domiciliary care.

It is quite apparent that the Government's reliance on contracting and purchasing arrangements does not in any way offer protection to vast numbers of elderly disabled and vulnerable people and will not avoid a repetition of such incidents. The Government's central assumption is of a local authority contracting with agencies for the provision of services. However, it is the case now, and will be the case after 1 April, that many people purchase these services privately without any form of local authority involvement. Such people therefore receive no protection whatsoever from the contracting arrangements, and the Government must be aware that the more stringent charging policies forced on local authorities are encouraging this process even further.

Many directors of social services have written to me supporting my proposed Bill, and several have pointed out that contractual arrangements are a very poor way of ensuring quality services at an individual level. One director said in his letter:

"Experience in the residential sector shows that placing authorities are often the very last to realise that abuses are going on involving their clients"

The extent of concern about the anomaly has led, in a number of areas, to the establishment of voluntary registration schemes. Many of those schemes are applying standards for registration for domiciliary care drawn up by the Joint Advisory Group of Domiciliary Care Associations. However, while such schemes are an important step forward, many of those organising them point to their weaknesses. Obviously, only the better agencies will volunteer to participate and those operating low standards are likely to be missed.

There is also no means of enforcement under such voluntary arrangements. As several directors of social services have said to me, voluntary schemes are a poor substitute for statutory regulations that would make the position of the service user, provider and local authority much clearer. In implementing the community care changes with effect from 1 April, the Government have included the requirement that 85 per cent. of the Department of Social Security funding that is passed to local authorities after next Thursday should be spent in what they call the independent sector. The Government anticipate that that will lead to more domiciliary provision by the voluntary and private agencies that are currently unregulated.

Many agencies have argued that the individual residing in his or her own home has the same right of protection under the law as those residing in a care or nursing home. In many ways, individuals are more at risk in the privacy of their own home. They are often housebound and frequently receive a declining number of visitors. Inevitably, the care staff helping them are supervised to a much lesser degree than they would be in a residential establishment.

On 30 November last year I asked the Department of Employment for its estimate of the number of independent sector domiciliary care agencies. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment replied that at that time there were 1,388 licensed employment agencies that had said that their field of activity might include domiciliary care. In addition to those agencies, an increasing number of private care and nursing homes also offer domiciliary services without specific registration and inspection. A sizeable number of agencies is already involved in such care and there is every reason to believe that the number will continue to increase.

My Bill is supported by the United Kingdom Home Care Association, which represents more than 300 voluntary and private agencies, the Joint Advisory Group of Domiciliary Care Associations, the British Association of Domiciliary Care Officers, the National Association of Inspection and Registration Officers, the British Association of Social Workers, and the Social Care Association. It is also supported by the Association of Directors of Social Services, Age Concern and many other interested organisations.

I understand that the social services inspectorate has drawn Ministers' attention to the need for such a measure.

[Mr. David Hinchliffe]

I would not be at all offended if the Government took the Bill off my hands and implemented it themselves. I am happy to commend it to the House.

No. 329, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 168a on page 46 of Cm 1934)'.

3.55 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I apologise for not giving you notice of this point of order. Will you enlighten the Committee and me about the content of amendment No. 456, which relates to the function of the European Court of Justice? We are now discussing the group of amendments in relation to article K.3(2)(c) and its application to articles L to S of the treaty.

I appreciate that article K and articles L to S are part of the alleged intergovernmental section of the treaty, which may not have direct and immediate legislative effect, but I think that you will agree that in article K.3(2)(c)—consequential on a convention which could be before the House at a future date—the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice does apply. As the amendment has not been selected, will it be possible to refer to this aspect of the European Court of Justice in the debate, or would it be more appropriate to table the amendment again, in another form, at a later stage of the Bill?

The Chairman: If the hon. Gentleman catches my eye, I am sure that he is ingenious enough to incorporate the matter in this debate.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): There has been a good deal of discussion lately about the Government's timetable for the progress of the Bill. They are clearly speeding up because on a previous occasion it took me three weeks to move from the beginning of one speech to the conclusion of another. This speech has taken a mere 13 days from when I began it to when I hope to finish.

On that occasion, 13 days ago, I invited the Attorney-General to explain how he sees the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice in the light of Britain's opt-out on the protocol on social policy. If other member states go ahead and legislate under the protocol—as legally they are entitled to do—what effect will that have on the case law and precedents of the European Court of Justice? Will it mean that there are two separate legal systems of case law in the European Community for the European Court of Justice: one for the 12 member states that will include the United Kingdom, and another—concerned particularly with social policy—for the other 11 member states that will have passed directives and established cases under that process?

Ultimately, that is a matter for the European Court of Justice, but there is a matter which affects courts in the United Kingdom because, under the European Communities Act 1972, they are bound by decisions of the European Court of Justice. Which series of precedents would the United Kingdom courts be bound by?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): My hon. Friend prefaced his remarks with a reference to the last time that he spoke. Although we may have different views about the Bill, does he agree that it is important that there should be careful deliberation in Committee of the amendment, any future amendments and new clauses? Is my hon. Friend aware that some people believe that the Government are determined to push the debate through the night—either through the entire night, thereby possibly destroying the next day's business, or very late—and that it all depends on support from the Liberals and the nationalists?

The Chairman: Order. That has absolutely nothing to do with the amendment.

4 pm

Mr. Hoon: I was referring to United Kingdom courts. If they are bound to follow the decisions of the European Court of Justice, how will they know which series of precedents to follow? Will they follow decisions taken under social protocol directives, where cases have been decided by the European Court of Justice or the other 11 member states, or will they follow the series of cases established by the Twelve? That is a point for the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice and, as a consequence, for United Kingdom courts. If the Attorney-General intends to sum up, I should be grateful if he would give some thought to the matter so that we can consider it afresh.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): I may be able to help the hon. Gentleman at this stage of the Committee's deliberations. He will agree that the protocol is quite clear that Acts adopted by the Council under it shall not be applicable to the United Kingdom. It therefore follows that any judgment that the European Court of Justice may give on such an Act would not be applicable to the United Kingdom. Any measure under the social protocol will not be Community law as such because its basis will be not the Community treaties but the agreement of 11 which flows from the protocol itself.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but I am not sure that it entirely deals with the problem. I was referring to the situation that arises when cases go all the way to the European Court of Justice. They are not minor cases but, as the Minister will agree, are usually landmark decisions where the court is not merely considering the intention of a particular directive. The protocol allows European Community institutions to be used to interpret case law in that way and, presumably, therefore allows the European Court of Justice to be involved. In those circumstances, when the court gives a decision, it is not merely giving a decision on one directive made under the protocol but will be reviewing the relevant cases in that domain.

Many of those cases will have been decided by the court when the United Kingdom was participating fully in the process of European Community law. Under the protocol, with the United Kingdom on one side—as the Minister said, that is the strict wording of the protocol—when the court has made a decision, it will have to be decided whether the United Kingdom courts and the European Court of Justice itself will follow it. I accept the strict wording of the protocol—the Minister was absolutely right to that extent—but I am more concerned about what the effect will be in terms of precedent.

It would be useful if the Attorney-General would comment. It would be curious if there were one set of cases which bound only 11 member states, because they had to do with a directive passed under the protocol on social policy, and another set of cases which included the United Kingdom. That is a point of legal confusion with which the Government must deal.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Although the Minister is correct about the wording of the protocol, surely the protocol itself is part of the treaty of Rome in that it is annexed to the treaty of Maastricht. Any proposal annexed to a treaty that becomes part of the treaty of Rome itself becomes an integral part of the treaty of Rome. The Minister cannot say that it is simply intergovernmental because it is part of the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Hoon: That is right, although the Minister clearly wishes to comment.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I think that the Committee will recognise that something else flows from the protocol—the agreement among the 11. That is an intergovernmental agreement. That is where any decisions that the 11 may choose to make would be taken, and it is outside the treaty.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, far from having resolved the problem, the Minister of State may have created a new problem? In the event of a decision to eliminate the protocol from British law, but not from the treaty, so that it is not a Community obligation for the agreement of the 11, would it not be wholly illegal for the Government to seek to make payments of one twelfth of the cost of the protocol? Then we would be in a terrible mess, which only our courts could resolve. That would take a long time.

Has the Minister of State not raised an issue about which we should all think carefully? If the protocol is removed from British law, there should be no obligation to make payments for a Community obligation, for the simple reason that, as the Minister of State said, there is no Community obligation but an obligation of the agreement of the 11.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for that observation. I suspect that the proper answer is that, when we have an opportunity, as we hope we shall, for a further debate on the implications of the social protocol, it may be possible to deal with that point.

Sir Teddy Taylor: It is over: it has already happened.

Mr. Hoon: Perhaps I may return——

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): A most important point has been raised in all seriousness. Perhaps the Minister, or the Attorney-General, would clarify the matter. Would such payments be ultra vires?

Mr. Hoon rose——

Sir Teddy Taylor: Answer.

Mr. Hoon: Again, that is not a matter for me, but perhaps the Minister would like to try to answer.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall try to assist the Committee. I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) was in the Chamber at the time, but the important question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) was dealt with on a previous occasion by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. Hoon: Perhaps I may leave that point now, and make some progress on what I was saying about institutional arrangements for the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) brings a great deal of skill and experience to our debates, and I am always interested in what he has to say, but is not the debate somewhat academic? I have just come back from Brussels, having visited the Commission, the European Parliament and other institutions, and I detected a gung-ho feeling there. People are concerned about ratification, but if and when the treaty is ratified they intend to go at full speed ahead—on the social chapter, among other things. They will say, "We want everybody to do it; we do not want those burdens to fall only on us. We want everybody to share in the glories, or the burdens, of the social chapter." The social protocol excludes the United Kingdom, so they will look for other ways to include us, via other routes through the treaty. Do not articles 2 and 3 of the treaty suggest that the European Court will be sympathetic to that approach, and that the protocol itself is therefore not a matter of great relevance? People will get what they want through other means, and the court will help them.

Mr. Hoon: That is certainly a possibility, and I shall develop that argument briefly later. Yes, the other 11 member states would like the United Kingdom to be fully part of that process—and the institutional difficulties that I have touched upon concerning the European Court of Justice arise equally in relation to the European Parliament, where there are moves to exclude British Members from participating in debates on social protocol questions. Clearly, that will create the institutional confusion across the Community about which I am now complaining in the context of the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): If there is a strong political element in the European Court of Justice, does not the hon. Gentleman consider it likely that the Commission will make suggestions to the court so that legal rights may be created to force the social chapter upon the United Kingdom by the back door? May not pressure also be brought to bear on the United Kingdom to conform more readily to the convergence criteria and the various other mechanisms that may ultimately lead to a single currency?

Mr. Hoon: I am tempted to agree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusion, although I do not accept his premise, which was to suggest that the European Court of Justice is not independent of political pressures. I do not believe that the court would be likely to respond to an invitation from the Commission in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I hope that I can assist the Committee. I think that I agree with the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. It is a mistake to assume that the European Court of Justice is bent upon bringing forward political judgments that are favourable to the centralising process.

As was made clear in an earlier debate, it is my contention, and that of the Government, that the position is changing. Only yesterday, the European Court of Justice issued a significant opinion on external competence. The Commission had argued that it had exclusive competence to negotiate in International Labour Organisation conventions. The court was of the opinion that that was a matter of mixed competence, in which member states have an important part to play. That illustrates the changed mood that the Maastricht treaty has brought about, not just in the court but throughout the Community.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the Minister.

I was about to say that there was an inevitable tendency, however one interprets the political approach of the European Court of Justice, for it to become involved in institutional questions. In effect, it sits as a sort of supreme court for the European Community, and therefore from time to time has to resolve such delicate institutional issues. I intended to mention the external relations case and cases concerned with the legal basis of directives. Those matters might previously have been resolved between Governments at the political level. The European Court of Justice inevitably finds itself caught up in political, institutional and constitutional debates.

The court set out how it views its own responsibility. It described the European Community as "a community based on the rule of law" with

"a complete system of legal remedies and procedures designed to commit the Court of Justice to review the legality of measures adopted by the institutions."

Clearly, the court sees itself as being at the centre of that institutional debate.

Mr. Winnick: I think that we agree that the role of the European Court of Justice is along the lines that my hon. Friend has suggested. That being so, if the Maastricht treaty is ratified, will not a time come—perhaps not too long afterwards—when the European Court of Justice may be asked to decide on cases brought by employees in the United Kingdom, who will argue that, if other countries have the social chapter, there is no reason why people in this country should not benefit from it? I shall not go into the rights and wrongs of the matter now; they will be decided later, and it will not be for us to decide them. We should not, therefore, reach the conclusion that the Government believe obvious, which is that, if the treaty goes ahead, the social chapter will not apply in Britain, because the European Court of Justice may decide otherwise.

Mr. Hoon: That is a possibility, and that will turn upon the way in which the court views the effectiveness of the opt-out on social policy.

An interesting case that is relevant to the whole question of the institutional responsibilities of the court was the ruling of the court on the EC-EFTA agreement. In looking at the structure proposed by the Commission and agreed by the Council of Ministers for the European economic area, the European Court of Justice took a quite different legal view from the political conclusions reached by the Commission and the Council. It said that the new treaty was clearly incompatible with the existing Community legal structure and was therefore unconstitutional.

The court was mainly concerned at that stage about the creation of a proposed EFTA court because it saw a potential rivalry between its competence and jurisdiction within the Community and the competence and jurisdiction of the proposed court to supervise the structure of the economic area.

What the court was concerned to do—this is significant—was to maintain a single and coherent jurisdiction. That was part of its reason for rejecting the approach agreed by the Commission and the Counci. If that is the case in terms of coherence, does it not follow from what I have been saying that the court might similarly be concerned about the lack of coherence created by the United Kingdom's opt-out on the social chapter? It seems to create some of the same difficulties from the point of view of a single structure for the European Community in the context of its legal system.

There are two potentially conflicting systems in operation, and while I accept the accuracy of the Minister's quotation from the social protocol, he could equally have quoted, in relation to the EC-EFTA agreement case, the decision that he and his colleagues in the Council of Ministers reached. The Court of Justice rejected that political conclusion and said that it was inconsistent with the structure that had been established.

An area in which the Maastricht treaty makes significant improvements is the ability of the European Parliament to bring proceedings before the court. That Parliament has faced difficulties in the past in asserting its institutional rights before the European Court of Justice. Although its vital institutional interests have been affected by certain court decisions, it has not always had the right to argue its case before the court.

4.15 pm

The Maastricht treaty significantly improves the position for the Parliament in that article 173 allows it to bring a legal challenge before the court

"for the purpose of protecting its prerogatives."

The importance of that lies in the fact that it permits a democratically elected institution to assert its institutional rights against other European Community institutions. Similarly, article 175, as revised by the treaty, improves the position of the Parliament by allowing it greater scope to bring actions before the court.

Those changes are to be welcomed and I hope that hon. Members, whatever their views about the general institutional arrangements, will support a situation which gives a democratically elected institution the right to participate in court cases on an equal basis with the European Commission and the Council.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): It is always a pleasure to speak following the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). We have discussed at length many issues about the European Court of Justice, on many of which we hold similar opinions.

I am concerned with amendments 329, 411, 416, 32 and 330, which relate to probably the most misunderstood part of the Community. When we started to discuss this group of amendments, the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) invited the Minister to comment on the philosophy of the European Court, and asked whether it was an interpretative and innovative court leading to centralisation. Those questions must be answered, and the Minister has not fully answered them. I shall demonstrate that the European Court of Justice is an innovative court, has drawn to itself greater powers, has enhanced the powers of the other Community institutions and, in so doing, has hastened what I believe is a movement towards centralisation.

When the Community's originators first set up the Court of Justice, their model was clearly the Conseil d'Etat of France. The choice of the Conseil d'Etat was no accident. Indeed, it was a significant act because it set the type and style of legal process for the Community. The importance of that role model needs explaining because the Conseil d'Etat has two distinct roles. It is both legal adviser to the Government and the supreme administrative law court, with competence to rule on any legal matter linked to, or arising from, administrative acts.

The consultation process of the Conseil d'Etat is compulsory in respect of Government measures and ordinances, and its opinions influence legislation. Its statements are never made public unless the Government so desire—we already begin to see some features of the court weaving their way through what is happening—so that the Conseil d'Etat has the ability to shape the direction of new legislation. Further, its anual report focuses on legislative reforms which it deems necessary and in the public interest. So there is a clear relationship between the Executive and that organisation. That is not surprising, because I note that, every year, the vice-president of the Conseil d'Etat presents the President of the Republic with new year's greetings on behalf of the civil service.

The role model for the European Court is a primary part of France's administration. I make those points clearly in discussing the power of the court to clarify how the court views its relationship with Community institutions and Community law, which is now being amended by the treaty of European union.

The originators of the European Economic Community ensured that the central ethos of the court would be more political than is the case in our common law law courts. That is reflected in appointments to the court. The treaties require that judges and advocates general should be chosen from "persons whose independence is beyond doubt and who possess the qualifications required for appointment to the highest judicial offices in their respective countries or who are jurisconsults of recognised competence".

It is significant that the independence of candidates is the paramount consideration, while professional qualifications and judicial experience are secondary. It is telling that, in the court of first instance, to which amendments Nos. 329, 411 and 416 apply, the criteria for judges' appointments is less rigorous even than that for the justices of the court.

There are great examples of judges not possessing any formal legal qualifications. Intriguingly, only a minority of appointees have had any judicial experience in their own countries. The majority come from different careers while holding merely formal legal qualifications. It is important to note that several judges have held ministerial posts in their own countries and that several others have been senior civil servants. Only three of the present judges have had judicial experience—[Interruption.] The present representative from the United Kingdom is not one of them.

Clearly, that range of previous experience goes well beyond purely legal qualifications and encourages the view that judges should rule on economic, social, administrative, fiscal and—of course, more and more—political issues within Community law. That the court has a clear conception of its role is evident when one looks at statements made by the courts advocates general.

The other evening, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State played down the role of the advocates general in the European Court. We are mistaken in doing that, because the advocates general are fully recognised as the court's external voice, and their opinions have proved an important element in the court's development. Seldom has the court disagreed with the advocates' opinion. As one authority put it:

"taken as a whole the opinions" of the advocates general

"are as much a product of Community view, and of the esprit de corps which characterises the Court as a whole, as are the judgments themselves."

That was given by J. Neville Brown, who wrote "The Court of Justice at the European Community".

By way of explanation, I shall cite a few examples of the esprit de corps of Community sentiment and where it leads. Advocate General Lagrange's opinion in the de Geus v. Bosch case was:

"the Court must not be defeated by obscurities or contradictions in the wording of the text for the real meaning can be deduced from the context or the spirit of the text".

Thus, the court is competent, by reference to the "spirit" of the treaty, to fill those gaps. Such teleological interpretation has become an accepted practice in the European Court. In filling the gaps, the court de facto takes a legislative role. It makes law. I refer hon. Members to my earlier comments on the Conseil d'Etat. That is another linkage.

The European Court of Justice has a powerful role in establishing the direction in which Community law evolves. Furthermore, the court has no doubt as to which direction this legislation should take. Advocate General Roemer said:

"The European treaties are nothing but a partial implementation of a grand general programme dominated by the idea of complete integration of the European States."

When we look at the court's judgments, it is plain to see that, in filling the legislative role, the court advances the cause of European nationhood. As Lasok and Bridge said:

"reference to the spirit or aims of the Treaties enables the Court to fill the gaps in the system and so to 'up-date' the text.

In doing so, the Court has consciously acted not only as the Constitutional Court of the Community but also as an architect of European integration."

The court has not been a protector of nation states' powers, as has been suggested previously. Nor has there been any change in the court's perception of its role. Progression of the European Court is slow at times, and is one of incremental revision.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Would my hon. Friend care to comment on the opinion on international labour organisations which was issued by the European Court only yesterday? If nothing else, I think that it gainsays the point, and shows that, at least recently—certainly since the agreement in Maastricht—the European Court of Justice is increasingly sensitive to and taking account of the position of member states.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Yes. That is an important point to make. I shall come to it further on in my speech. I talk continually about the fact that the European Court of Justice never moves back on its judgments but always moves forwards, sometimes at a slower pace, sometimes at a faster pace. It takes into consideration what is going on in a general sense politically, but the process is always the same.

Mr. Budgen: The irony of the Minister of State's interruption is that it completely demolishes his point that the European Court of Justice is an independent, apolitical court. All he said was that observations of a political nature had been made throughout the Maastricht process, and that the court now took account of those political views. It is a political court, even though he happens to approve of the political pressures which are now being applied to the court.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My hon. Friend summarises that point well. It stands on its own.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall not respond to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

Mr. Budgen: Why not?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Because I am answering the speech of the person who has caught your eye, Mr. Morris, not interventions. My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) says that the European Court of Justice always moves forwards. What about the case that I quoted to him the last time that he made a rather distinguished speech to the Committee? The national insurance case moved exactly in the direction that he and I would wish to see.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My right hon. Friend raises a case which was referred to on the last occasion, and on the occasion before that on which we debated the matter. I shall deal with that case in due course, if he will bear with me.

The danger is that, if one views the court at only a single point, it may appear no longer to be driven by the dictates of unification. However, if the Committee considers the progression of the court's judgments over time, all becomes clear. At times, the court appears to stop and consolidate its gains before the next advance, but advance it will. By so doing, it gives great power to the Community institutions.

The titanium dioxide case in 1991, in which the European Parliament supported the Commission versus the Council, was a clear example of how the court increases the powers of the Commission and the European Parliament at the expense of the nation states. In effect, when contention as to the basis of voting procedures arises, the qualified majority process is preferred to unanimous voting. That calls into question Ministers' assurances that qualified majority voting will be extended only to those areas to which we agree that it should.

I wish to show the Court's incremental revision. If we examine four cases taken from a period of more than 25 years, it becomes clear that the Court has progressively expanded the domain of Community law. It moves forward, then consolidates, only to move forward again.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We are resuming a debate that we have had before. I have conceded that, in the early stages of the Community's development, the European Court of Justice took what I have referred to as several centripetal decisions. I think that I quoted to my hon. Friend in the Committee's last debate on these matters several cases in the past 12 months.

I do not claim that they represent a complete turnaround. Indeed, it is not for me to anticipate the decisions that the European Court of Justice might take any more than the decisions of the British courts. However, those cases began to move in the opposite direction to the one which my hon. Friend contends that the court always moves in. I should be grateful if the cases which my hon. Friend quoted to the House were moderately recent ones. We are all well aware of cases which took place 10 and 15 years ago.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My right hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I have said, and I repeat, that I shall come to those cases. I am referring to a period of 25 years which brings us up to the present. I seek to show that the present is still involved as much as the past. I do not seek to avoid what my right hon. Friend asks me to do.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The point that I am seeking to make to my hon. Friend is not that I dispute that decisions 10, 15 and 20 years ago have tended to be centripetal in their thrust, but that, in recent years, and particularly in the light of skilful negotiation by the Prime Minister at Maastricht on article 3b and so forth, a climate is now being created as a result of which a significant number of recent court judgments show sensitivity to the rights of member states which are both important and encouraging.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: If the Minister bears with me, I shall try to point out the reasons why I take a different view.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Before the Minister of State gets carried away by his optimism, will my hon. Friend invite him to speak to the British fishermen who were absolutely appalled at the fairly recent case in which our merchant shipping legislation was torn apart by the court and Spanish fishermen had to be treated as British for national quota purposes? Does my hon. Friend notice that, whenever such a point is raised, the Minister of State always finds an excuse to talk to someone else? Is this not real stuff, affecting real people? Will the Minister stop being carried away by false optimism?

4.30 pm

Mr. Duncan-Smith: As usual, my hon. Friend makes a powerful point which stands on its own: I cannot elaborate on it. He is absolutely right: these things affect real people and the judgments of the European Court have a major effect on individuals.

Mr. Marlow: So that my hon. Friend can make a decent spread, there are a few points that——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman may make one short intervention.

Mr. Marlow: That was my intention, Mr. Morris, but other hon. Gentlemen have already raised points, and if those points are aggregated to the one that I am about to make, they become a few points.

Is it possible that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State is being a little naive? To a certain extent, do not Europe and the court work as a ratchet? My right hon. Friend said that the European courts have made favourable decisions in terms of nation states in the past 12 months, but during the past 12 months we have been considering the ratification of the treaty. Once the treaty is ratified, bingo—off they go again.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My hon. Friend makes his point in his characteristic way. I am not sure about bingo, but I am pretty sure about the European Court of Justice. If my right hon. Friend the Minister will bear with me, I hope to cover these points.

I mentioned the historic Van Gend en Loos case previously. It was a landmark of Community law, because it was where the Court first enunciated that the treaties created a new legal order.

Mr. Garel-Jones: What was the date of the case?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I shall provide the date in a moment. The case established that the treaties created a new legal order based on the principle that Community law produces "direct effects and creates individual rights".

The date of the case was 1963.

From this beginning, the court has taken progressively more expansive views of the principle of direct effect. In the van Duyn ruling of 1974, the court stated that individuals may invoke Community directives before national courts.

In its 1976 ruling, in the Defrenne case, the court applied the principle of direct effect to article 119 on sex equality. It found that the principle of equal pay for men and women laid down in the article was one of the Community's foundations and so had direct effect. It went on to say that national courts "have a duty to ensure the protection of the rights which that provision vests in individuals".

After the 1976 Defrenne ruling, the court paused, consolidating the gains made. Interestingly, in 1978, after Gabrielle Defrenne initiated yet another case, the court indicated that the interpretation of article 119 could not be expanded to the point that it would seem as prescribing equality in respect of all working conditions. Specifically, the court ruled that article 119 did not require identical retirement ages for men and women, even though this would result in differences in pension entitlement.

If an observer of the court had looked at the Defrenne ruling in 1978, he or she might have been tempted to say, as my right hon. Friend said recently,

"that we are now in a new climate and that that"

centralising

"tendency is being arrested."—[Official Report, 27 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 1061.]

In doing so, the observer would be focusing too closely on the immediate circumstances and not on the court's long-term progression.

If we come forward 12 years to the Barber case of 1990, here the court has reversed the 1978 ruling. The court found in the Barber case that "it is contrary to"

article 119

"to impose an age condition which differs according to sex for the purpose of entitlement to a pension under a private occupational scheme, even if the difference between the pensionable age for men and that for women is based on the one provided for by the national statutory scheme."

That was in 1990.

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Perhaps I can just finish this point.

In the 1978 decision, the court was simply holding its ground. It was in no way reversing itself. The court may pause for periods, but it does not retrace its steps, so there is a progression—slow, slow, quick, quick, slow.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It will not have escaped the notice of the Committee—I hasten to say that I do not use this to dismiss my hon. Friend's point—that, of the cases that my hon. Friend has quoted, one predates Britain's entry into the Community, two predate the Single European Act and one follows on from it. I am not using this to dismiss my hon. Friend's arguments, because I accept that the thrust of the court has been centripetal for a substantial period. But then my hon. Friend goes on, as the "killer" argument, as it were, to quote the Barber judgment, and again it will not have escaped the notice of the Committee that a protocol in the Maastricht treaty reverses that judgment.

That does two things. It emphasises that it is member states which sign the treaties and, in reversing the Barber judgment in the protocol, it gives us reason to believe—although I cannot anticipate decisions of the European Court—that it will have a significant influence on other judgments that we expect shortly in this area.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My right hon. Friend raises a point to which I am just about to come, so if he will bear with me I will deal with it now.

The court can afford to take a long view, and will gradually expand the scope of Community law in just the way that it has in the Barber decision. It is impossible for anyone to deny that the Barber case is a significant advance in the reach of Community law. Consternation about its effects for the pension industry has been so acute that, as my right hon. Friend has pointed out, a specific protocol concerning article 119 had to be added to the Maastricht treaty to limit the industry's exposure to retroactive claims. This protocol is nothing more than a rearguard action, designed to contain the damage inflicted by the court's Barber ruling.

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I would like to make just a little progress before I give way again.

The example of incremental revision that I have just given is not an isolated instance of how the court will expand especially the Commission's powers at the expense of the nation states. Such progression in the court's rulings is an on-going phenomenon, since, in pursuit of its own agenda, the Commission regularly invites the court to revisit and reinterpret the treaty base and the large body of existing Community directives and regulations.

We are in the midst of one such example. As a result of a number of court interpretations of the directive on the transfer of undertakings, United Kingdom law was found by the Commission to be no longer compliant with the original directive. In 1981, when Parliament passed the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations into law, in compliance with the original directive, Ministers did not anticipate how much more widely the scope of this directive would be interpreted.

The Commission's recent action taken against the United Kingdom shows how the Community institutions, working in tandem, can force us to adopt statutes against our will—like clause 62 of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill.

Mr. Hoon: I do not want to tempt the hon. Member into misleading the Committee, but the transfer of undertakings directive was passed by a Labour Government, and was not properly translated into United Kingdom law in 1981 by a Conservative Government. That is really the difference. The British Government participated in the process of agreeing the directive, and it is that which the hon. Gentleman ought to concentrate on, rather than trying to wriggle out of the obligation created by the directive. In the way that he has presented it, he has given a very jaundiced view of the process.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman, as usual, makes an important point. I was going to come on to that, because I was about to point out that it was initiated in 1977.

The Chairman: Might I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he should not give way so often but should get on with his arguments, as he would clearly anticipate most interventions?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I shall endeavour to follow your guidance, Mr. Morris.

That case is intriguing, because it demonstrates clearly how a policy initiated in 1977 is binding on subsequent Conservative Administrations, causing severe problems for Conservative Governments.

I was disappointed that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned the same three cases—which I said that I would deal with—that he produced on 27 January as an example of the European Court of Justice's new-found appreciation for the rights of nation states. Those cases do not support the thesis. At best, they demostrate the court marking time, and at worst incremental revision.

The case of the Commission v. Belgium—Wallonian sludge—was particularly obscure. At most, the ruling was ambiguous. The court was highly critical of the Wallonian decree and refrained from ruling against Belgium only because it found conflicting treaty objectives of environmental protection to support the decree. Belgium was no clear victor; it is important to note that each party had to bear its costs at the end of the case, which says more loudly than words what the court felt about it.

The Sunday trading case that the Minister mentioned is a perfect example of incremental revision expanding the court's powers. In the Stoke-on-Trent judgment, the court revised its previous Torfaen verdict that questions of proportionality should be left to the national courts, and ruled that the European Court had the power and the duty to rule on issues of proportionality—a form of incremental revision.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): The most important aspect of the Torfaen case is that it was strongly qualified by the words

"in the present state of Community law."

That would seem to emphasise that the court sees the development of Community law as an on-going process from which competences are never returned to the member states.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My hon. Friend has elaborated on my argument, and I am grateful.

In the Equal Opportunities Commission v. Secretary of State for Social Security——

Sir Teddy Taylor: Before he leaves the subject of duty, will my hon. Friend ask the Minister of State, who is so optimistic of the court, to answer the question why, when the Government were presented with five infraction proceedings relating to the transfer of undertakings regulations, they caved in on four without taking them to the court? The only issue left is whether there is a registered trade union or merely workers' representatives.

If the Minister is so sure that things are going nicely on national interests, why did the Government cave in to four of the five Commission demands without putting up a fight? Perhaps he should get advice from the civil service, from the Government or from anyone else. If he is so confident, why did the Government cave in, as the demands were way ahead of the view of the acquired rights directive held by the Conservative Government in 1981, and the previous Labour Government in 1971?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: As usual, my hon. Friend makes a powerful intervention.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Why does the Minister not intervene?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is interrupting the speech of the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith), and the Committee wishes to listen.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Guided by you, Mr. Morris, I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister has heard that intervention clearly, and I leave it to his judgment to decide at which point he prefers to answer.

I feel that the case that I was discussing before the intervention was an example of the court marking time. It does not like derogations and never has. At best, it sees them as temporary and transitional means. However, that case followed closely on the Barber case, and just as the court was not willing to make that additional leap in the 1978 Defrenne ruling so soon after the significant advance made in the 1976 case, in the EOC-NICs case I believe that the court is biding its time before its next move in that area. Obviously, that is a personal view of the court's exact political involvement in and view of the Community. It is the same pattern—slow, slow, quick, quick, slow.

4.45 pm

There needs to be a positive effort to reform the court. Before we allow it to expand its competence in the way envisaged by the articles under consideration, we must have some controls on the European court and, as the court has clearly stated in Costa v. ENEL:

"The transfer by the States from their domestic legal system to the Community legal system of the rights and obligations arising under the Treaty carries with it a permanent limitation of their sovereign rights, against which a subsequent unilateral act incompatible with the concept of the Community cannot prevail."

Obviously, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General appreciates that. I refer back to his comments on 22 February, when he pointed out the supremacy of Community law.

National rights will be jeopardised if the court continues to expand its competence unchecked, and if it is permitted to legislate by filling in the gaps left by the treaties and secondary Community legislation.

Maastricht only creates more gaps. A few weeks ago in the Committee, I tried to point out one such gap arising from Maastricht's new social provisions. Other hon. Members have indicated other ways, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) in his recent comments on subsidiarity.

In his comments on 27 January, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said that the European Court of Justice was "like the Supreme Court in the United States."—[Official Report, 27 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 1057.]

That is very interesting. Apart from wondering whether that is accepted by the Government——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I think that I can anticipate my hon. Friend's argument. I made it clear that the Supreme Court in the United States is the supreme court of a single national federal state, which is not what the European Community is or will become. I was seeking to argue that the judgments of courts of that type are cyclical and are influenced by the society that surrounds them. My hon. Friend says that it is a case of quick, quick, slow but it will not have escaped his notice that those are the steps of the waltz, and that one can move forwards and backwards when dancing a waltz.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for clarifying his earlier statesment but I shall not get involved in that dance as I was never very good in the ballroom.

We therefore require an institutional mechanism to alow us to review Community laws and regulations created by the European court in the manner that I have described.

A comparison has been made with the United States Supreme Court, but the European Court does not have similar constitutional checks and balances to temper its power. Article 55 of the French constitution is an example of such a mechanism. Unlike Britain—where, under the terms of article 3(2) of the European Communities Act 1972, Community law may be directly referred to in our courts—in France a judge may not directly invoke the primacy of Community law but must reason indirectly, via article 55, to dismiss statute law which conflicts with treaty obligations.

Article 55 is the sole channel for Community law in France, giving the French constitutional court the competence

"to carry out a direct review of Community law in cases where Community legislation can be fitted into the category of France's 'international commitments'".

Such reviews analyse not the legitimacy of Community law, but its compatibility with domestic law.

Such a system for review is what Britain lacks and most definitely needs. In the short term, to ensure that we retain immediate control of our constitution, I propose that we should adopt the solutions set out by Martin Howe in a recent pamphlet called "Europe and the Constitution after Maastricht".

First, we ought to lay down procedures to be followed when conflicts between Community law and Acts of Parliament arise. Secondly, we must have an express list of protected matters, which no Community law should, under the law of the United Kingdom, be allowed to affect. Thirdly, we should be armed with reserve powers, exercisable by Order in Council, to render specific decisions or acts of the Community institutions of no effect in the United Kingdom in areas which are essential to our national interest and independence.

Those changes would help, but I seek a total reform of the European Court of Justice. In my maiden speech, I suggested that we needed a long-term solution, such as a constitutional court, which would be placed above the Community to take an impartial position on questions which affect the competence of nation states.

The opportunity to reform the court arose at Maastricht, but was not seized. Maastricht advances the power of the court, giving it room for interpretation in so many areas, not least in the social field and convergence criteria, with all the attendant costs.

Ministers' assurances carry little weight when the powers of the European Court are examined closely. How can we believe Ministers when they seek to reassure the House about the interpretation of articles 2 and 3 on social policy, and that we shall not be forced into the restrictive social practices undertaken by the other 11? It will be for the court, not for Ministers, to decide.

How can we accept the assurances of Ministers about our commitment to the second and third stages of the convergence criteria? Again, it will be the court, not they, that ultimately decides. How can we accept from Ministers reassurances about subsidiarity? As my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North pointed out, the court will define and make decisions on subsidiarity.

The European Court is now an immensely powerful institution, which I believe to be beyond the control of this or any other nation state. Far from concentrating on this fact at Maastricht and in subsequent debates, we have allowed ourselves to be sidetracked and have even enhanced the court's powers. As we have seen in case after case, ultimate judgment lies with the European Court of Justice, which will seek to hasten the march towards a central unitary European state. The court holds the greatest threat to those who wish to see Europe move in the opposite direction. Maastricht is simply an invitation to continue down the road to a unitary state.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Mr. Budgen.

Mr. Budgen: I did not anticipate being called at this stage.

The Chairman: If the hon. Gentleman does not wish to speak, he does not have to do so.

Mr. Budgen: I do, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: In that case, the hon. Gentleman should get on with his speech.

Mr. Budgen: I was merely explaining my unusual reluctance to participate in a debate.

The question that has been raised is whether we can trust the European Court. Whether one can trust a court depends upon whether one believes that it is free of political influences. We have just heard an extremely helpful, very learned, extremely well-researched and longish speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith). My hon. Friend reviewed the court's activities over a considerable period and confirmed our fear that what we have here is an example of what my noble Friend Lady Thatcher used to describe as the ratchet effect. The former Prime Minister did not for a moment pretend that the ratchet moved forward at the same pace all the time. This ratchet is very well maintained by an extremely large bureaucracy staffed by a very large number of extremely intelligent—and, incidentally, extremely well paid—people. That being the case, it was to be expected that it would be operated very intelligently. No doubt the same was said of the inquisition when it was doing its work.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Maastricht treaty contains the French words "acquis communautaire", which describe the ratchet precisely?

Mr. Budgen: Of course that is true.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford is very helpful in the way in which he investigates the background of Community thought regarding the setting up of something that is half a supreme court and half an administrative court. However, he does not emphasise the essential difference between, on the one hand, the French idea of justice and the French idea of the supremacy of the power of the state and, on the other hand, our adversarial system, which is based on disputes between private individuals and, most of all, upon the extremely limited role given to the courts of this country.

For all their grandeur and for all their necessary importance, our courts and judges are but narrow technicians. They are not legislators. It is not their job to talk, for instance, about the moral or political climate. Their job is to look carefully and in detail at provisions and determine their effect on a particular dispute between individuals. Only in the French system are wider political considerations allowed to be brought into play.

I suggest that on this occasion the Government are best condemned from their own mouths. At the last sitting of this Committee my right hon. Friend the Minister of State made for the first time a point that he has made several times today. He said:

"Although it would be wrong and inappropriate for me to try to anticipate specific judgments, I believe that there is some evidence that the climate created by the Maastricht negotiations has brought about change."—[Official Report, 11 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 1182.]

That reference is to changes in the judgments of the European Court. This afternoon, my right hon. Friend said—I may be wrong about this, but I did make a note—that the judgments of the court had been influenced by the skilful negotiation of the Prime Minister at Maastricht.

Let us pause for a moment and decide what is the present status, in Community law, of the Maastricht negotiations. The treaty has not been ratified by all the countries of the Community. It is merely in a preliminary state. It is just as much in a preliminary state as, for instance, Conservative party conference discussions about the criminal law might be. One might even give the treaty a more elevated role by giving as an example the fact that the provisions of a Bill are not binding on the Law Lords before it has been passed by Parliament.

The Minister says that this is not a political court and that it is free of political interference, but he then has the impertinence to say that we have influenced it by our political activity. He says that this is a splendid, independent body, totally impervious to political activity, but that it is watching the political activities of the Prime Minister and doing what my right hon. Friend wants. By way of commendation of these proposals, my right hon. Friend says that this is a court influenced by mood. Our courts are not influenced by mood; they are bound by precedent and statute. They are bound by an extremely narrow interpretation of their duties; they are not bound by mood.

Let me present an argument about mood. There is no doubt that at the time of the Birmingham bombings there was in the country a mood that it would be right for certain persons to be convicted and even hanged—although there was no hanging—as quickly as possible. Would it have been right for the Court of Appeal to take the view that it should operate on the basis of the mood of the country, which was that the rules of evidence which protect suspected persons should be disregarded? At that time people would have been entirely in favour of allowing police officers to fabricate evidence, on the ground that the police knew perfectly well that these people had committed the offences, although, unfortunately, the necessary evidence was not available. But, of course, that is not what was done, because our courts are not bound by mood. Nor, indeed, are they influenced in any way by what politicians say.

Let me give another example. If it is right to say that this court should be influenced by what happened at Maastricht, what would be said were the Lord Chief Justice, dealing with the sentence for a rapist, to say that he had noted with interest and approval the exciting views of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), who has elegantly suggested that such people's goolies should be cut off?

The Lord Chief Justice says, "There is no legislation on the issue, but I am influenced by the political mood of the moment, so I shall order that their goolies be cut off." That is exactly the disgraceful argument that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State advances when he says that the court is not a political body, but it is being influenced by political views of which he approves.

There can be no trust in the institution. If, today, it is being influenced by the political views of the Prime Minister—views that are in no way encompassed by European legislation and in no way bound by European precedent—it is just as likely to be influenced by other forms of political pressure next week when those pressures will seem stronger. It is a political court to which we are giving extra power. We are allowing it to fine people. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said, we are allowing it to decide the fines in the light of the advice offered to it by a political body—the Commission. That is very dangerous.

5 pm

We must understand that our British tradition is to give a court extremely limited powers and leave the process of legislation to our sovereign Parliament. The answers given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State when he so naively commended the way in which the court was now being influenced by political views of which he approved clearly showed that my right hon. Friend has condemned the court to be known by all the world as a political court, and a court that we cannot trust.

Mr. Spearing: The previous two speeches, which have been constitutional, not party political, in tone, have illustrated the extent to which the European Court of Justice is already superior in many ranges of legislation and statute to the high court of Parliament and even the House of Lords in its judicial function along the Corridor. Today we are being invited to discuss the further extension of those powers. I endorse some aspects of the speeches of the hon. Members for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith). The powers belong to a court that is different from the institution of which people in this country automatically think when confronted with the word "court".

The court will be a quasi—if not a full—constitutional court in terms of interpreting titles II, III and IV of the treaty of Rome. Therefore, in some respects, the court to which we are now voluntarily—and possibly irrevocably—sending our powers will be comparable to the Federal Court of the United States. As has been said, the European Court has political angles that do not apply to any of the courts in the United Kingdom.

The preambles of treaties should be taken into account when interpreting the wording of those treaties. Whereas, in this country, if case law is made through a judgment and we then find that it is unworkable—it may have been the right judgment for a specific case, but present complications in relation to another case—the Government can introduce a Bill. Hopefully, that Bill will not be politically contentious and the legislation can be set right, either in that parliamentary Session or the next one. That process will not be possible in future in relation to any matter over which the European Court of Justice has power.

The court's range of opinion is much greater than may at first appear. The hon. Member for Chingford cited some recent cases that are well known, including the Barber case and the Cassis de Dijon case. However, people may not be aware of the following aspects—although I think that some statistics appeared in Hansard not long ago. Where a matter of interpretation in the British domestic court—I use the phrase advisedly—falls within the sphere of Community law, magistrates, justices or their Lordships have to obtain an opinion from the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg. That fact is not always immediately visible. I do not know whether, when he replies, the Attorney-General will tell us whether it is made known at the time that a further opinion has to be taken, but I doubt whether it is, as I understand that the number of references is already sizeable and will grow. I understand that to be the position today.

The treaty contains further powers, some of which seem mild at present. Articles 126 and 127 on training and education come within the formal upgraded treaty of Rome, as does the issue of health in article 129. I know that article 129 involves co-operation in health matters to ensure that the resources for public health are dealt with effectively and efficiently. But no doubt at some stage an issue will arise where the interpretation of the articles on health and education will come before the European Court of Justice. We know about the famous subsidiarity. Such matters will not fall entirely within the powers of the treaty, which requires subsidiarity to be illuminated, but they will come within the powers of the court—or at least have the potential to do so.

I wish to refer to the powers of the court other than those that fall under titles II, III and IV. The Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister have made great play of the fact that the power of the European Community will not be as centripetal as it has been. Time and time again they have said that we have stopped the expansion of centralist forces. They claim that we have rolled back those forces in that, whereas the treaty that the Dutch placed before the Community in 1991 had a complete institutional hold, we inserted into that—by our skilful talks at Maastricht—intergovernmental provisions outside the power of the treaty. I think that the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister may have been over-optimistic, as there are more than 50 references to Community institutions inside the the so-called union pillars.

I shall concentrate on those references to the power of the court of justice in relation to home and judicial affairs. Those issues are mentioned in article K. The treaty also includes articles relating to institutions other than the European Court of Justice which deal with foreign and security matters. The title covering foreign and security issues contains no fewer than 22 references to Community institutions.

I wish to talk about further powers that the House of Commons may allow the European Court of Justice. Title VI, article K3.2.(c) sounds as though it is a small matter and indeed it is in small print. However, I am sure that the Attorney-General knows—he has made it clear in correspondence—that article K3.2.(c) gives power of adjudication to the European Court of Justice where a convention has been agreed between the member states. The convention can relate to any of the issues contained in article K.1 which deal with co-operation in the spheres of justice and home affairs.

I am well aware that the convention need not occur. The treaty contains the power to create the conventions, although they are not yet created.

Article K3.2(c) states:

"without prejudice to Article 220 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, draw up conventions which it shall recommend to Member States for adoption in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements.

Unless otherwise provided by such conventions, measures implementing them shall be adopted within the Council by a majority of two-thirds of the High Contracting Parties."

The "Council" means the Council of the Community, acting no doubt in its extended intergovernmental role. The article continues:

"Such conventions may stipulate that the Court of Justice shall have jurisdiction to interpret their provisions and to rule on any disputes regarding their application, in accordance with such arrangements as they may lay down."

I understand, as I think the whole Committee understands, that before such a convention can be adopted it has to come back to this Parliament for approval under, as the treaty says, "respective constitutional requirements."

So far we have not had a full definition of what shall be the United Kingdom's constitutional requirements. Perhaps the Attorney-General will refer to that. That phrase appears three or four times in the treaty and it is fundamental. It will also apply to further amendments and there is no guarantee that the treaty will not be further amended before 1996. Who knows, there may be need for a further adjustment and the treaty may come back for further constitutional debate and agreement.

I hope that such a constitutional provision would be defined by an Act of Parliament. Would it be appropriate for a convention concerning home and judicial affairs related to the domestic arrangements of the United Kingdom to be dealt with other than by an Act of Parliament or a change to existing legislation, which would require a small Act of Parliament? What is the scope and probability of what the conventions would contain? They are listed in article K1.

One of the features of the reportage of these debates has been the feeling that we are going through the treaty line by line. To some extent we are doing that in so far as procedures allow, and there is a feeling that it is all terribly boring. It is said that people outside cannot understand the debate and that the Committee is following arcane procedures. I have a horrible feeling that in future when the European Court of Justice makes a ruling, as it did in relation to VAT on construction, people will say, "When did Parliament agree to that?"

The so-called Trevi arrangements clearly intend that there shall be conventions and those conventions will affect the matters set out in article K1, which talks about:

"1. asylum policy;

2. rules governing the crossing by persons of the external borders of the Member States and the exercise of controls thereon;".

One cannot get much more basic than that about border control.

"3. immigration policy and policy regarding nationals of third countries;

I shall not quote the subsections, but they relate to conditions of entry, conditions of residence and the combating of unauthorised immigration.

"4. combating drug addiction in so far as this is not covered by 7 to 9;

5. combating fraud on an international scale in so far as it is not covered by 7 to 9;

6. judicial co-operation in civil matters;

8. customs co-operation;

9. police co-operation for the purposes of preventing and combating terrorism, unlawful drug trafficking and other serious forms of international crime, including if necessary certain aspects of customs co-operation, in connection with the organisation of a Union-wide system for exchanging information within a European Police Office (Europol)."

I have read those into the record because it is unlikely that United Kingdom citizens are fully aware of some of the treaty's contents. I am worried that this title is presently excluded from the Bill. However, the powers of the European Court of Justice are not. As we know, that court is one of the foundation and fundamental institutions of the European Community and, according to the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister, it is the inner trunk that is supported by the outer pillars. One of the outer pillars, title VI, has the European Court of Justice.

5.15 pm

I have written to the Foreign Secretary about the matter and he kindly wrote to me on 17 March. His letter clarifies the matter, but is rather surprising. I asked him about article K3.2(c) being outside the institutions of the Community and suggested that his claims and that of the Prime Minister about the supports of the edifice were a little exaggerated.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I am listening with great attention to the hon. Gentleman. He gives the impression that, if the general public understood that some international issues were included in one form or another in the treaty, they would instantly repudiate it. Surely the reverse is the truth. Just as the international law of the sea is justiciable in an international court, a whole range of international problems that are growing in intensity require international treatment. Many of my constituents would be exceedingly relieved if problems such as international terrorism could be dealt with in that way.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for intervening on that issue. His intervention illustrates the theme of the arguments of many hon. Members, that the real content of the treaty of European union—which is the correct title of the treaty—is not as well known as it should be. It is not, and the Government, despite issuing a few publications, do not want it to be better known.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office enters the Committee at just the right moment. He knows that I and my hon. Friends, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), and some Conservative Members support a private Member's Bill called the European Union (Public Information) Bill. It sets out a statutory procedure, which may get more publicity later, by which hon. Members will know what is in the Bill that is before the Committee.

I shall not stray too far from the subject of the debate, but one of the matters contained in our Bill, if the Government allow it to go through—they have objected to it on 15 or 16 Fridays——

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not clear about what I said earlier. The matter that he is discussing is out of order. Perhaps he will return to discussing the European Court of Justice about which he was making an interesting contribution.

Mr. Spearing: I was questioned by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced member of the Committee and should not be tempted to go down that route.

Mr. Spearing: I shall return to the correspondence from the Home Secretary.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Before the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) get too excited and optimistic about this great new opportunity, would the hon. Member for Newham (Mr. Spearing) remind him and the Committee that under article L, which we are discussing, a common foreign and security policy and justice and home affairs are excluded from the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. Spearing: Some of those matters might have been cleared up if the Government had not taken the action that they did.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I would not want it recorded that I was tempting the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) down the route that he chose when he answered my question, because my question was rather different.

The Chairman: That is firmly on the record and clearly the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) did not hear the hon. Gentleman's intervention with sufficient clarity. Either way, perhaps we may return to the subject of the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Spearing: In his letter to me dated 17 March, the Minister of State wrote:

"As for the potential role of the European Court of Justice under Article K.3(2)(c), you misunderstood the jurisdiction the Court might be given. It would not be the jurisdiction it now has under EEC treaties, nor would its rulings be binding in Community law. It would be ad hoc jurisdiction, conferred and regulated by a member state convention outside the EC framework to interpret that convention and to settle disputes on it. This is exactly the present position on the convention on mutual recognition and enforcements of judgments among the member states agreed in 1968 pursuant to article 220 of the Treaty of Rome. The European Court of Justice rulings on the 1968 convention are given force in UK law not by the European Communities Act but by the 1982 Civil Jurisdiction Act."

That may be news to some of us. I have no doubt that the lawyers among us, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), may be familiar with that matter.

It is interesting to learn that the European Court of Justice has vires and power in the United Kingdom by Acts of Parliament other than the European Communities Act 1972 and other matters relating directly to it.

That information may be important. No doubt the Attorney-General will confirm when he replies that that which is written into the home affairs article that I just quoted and the power of the European Court of Justice is given dual authenticity by the treaty itself—which is not particularly the concern of the House—by direct legislation and another Act of Parliament.

I put down a marker now because if such a convention comes before the House in due course—which I hope will require another Act—we should have a full explanation, because we would then be putting ourselves under direct European Court jurisdiction on important matters that are claimed to be intergovernmental. Those matters, and others to which the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) referred, are best dealt with in that way, rather than within the rigidities of the European Community as originally established, its central institutions, or the Act of European union that is now being debated.

Mr. Timothy Kirkhope (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your guidance. We are about to embark on a debate of a group of nearly 50 amendments. You and the hon. Members who have been present during the Committee stage will remember that there was considerable confusion about the character and nature of amendment No. 27. In a statement, the Foreign Secretary said:

"In summary, the Law Officers consider that, while incorporation of the protocol in domestic law is desirable, it is not necessary for ratification or implementation of the Maastricht treaty."—[Official Report, 15 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 27.]

We desperately need your advice, Mr. Morris, or possibly that of a Minister through you, as to which of the 50 amendments, which cover a number of protocols and articles, fall into the "desirable" category and which fall into the "necessary" category for ratification. Otherwise, we shall not know the level of seriousness that we are to give to each amendment. The Committee was caught completely by surprise when it found that amendment No. 27 was desirable but not necessary for ratification. May we have some advice and information as to which amendment falls into which category?

The Chairman: First, that is not a matter for the Chair. Secondly, we have not started yet, so no one can rule on anything until the procedure is under way.

Without further ado, we shall consider the European system of central banks and national banking arrangements. We lead with amendment No. 36, with which we shall consider the others listed on the selection paper. I call Mr. Andrew Smith.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) rose——

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I hope that this is a new point of order and not the same one that we have just had.

Mr. Hain: It is, Mr. Morris. I wonder whether—[Interruption.] It certainly is a new point of order. I wonder whether, with your indulgence, Mr. Morris, the Attorney-General could give a ruling on whether amendment No. 36, if carried, would actually——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating. The amendment has not even been moved yet.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 107 on page 22 of Cm 1934)'.

Mr. Smith: Let me make it clear that amendment No. 36, as with similar amendments tabled in other groups, is a probing amendment, and it is not our intention to press it to a vote. However, new clause 1 and new clause 58, which we have also tabled, are also in the group, and they relate to the important questions of the accountability of the Bank of England and of the European central bank. We intend to press those to a vote.

I make it clear at the outset that the Labour party's views on the issues before us are set in the context of the vital importance of two requirements: first, that the provisions of article 2 of the treaty set the goals of the Community, and that the economic institutions of the Community are obliged to put those goals into effect; and, secondly, that ECOFIN—the Council of European Finance Ministers—must be strengthened not only as the proper political counterweight to the system of central banks but as an effective co-ordinator of Community policies for jobs and sustainable growth. An important complaint about the Government's record is that during their presidency of the Community they took no initiative to give ECOFIN that enhanced role.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman make it clear that new clause 1 is a joke, because it simply says that there should be an annual report? That will have no impact, and there will be no power, because we shall simply talk about the annual report. The issue behind amendment No. 36 is whether a central bank should be democratically accountable. As a member of the Labour party and a friend of democracy, surely the hon. Gentleman should support an amendment saying that a central bank that will run our economy should be democratically accountable in some way. Was that not Labour party policy?

Mr. Smith: I well understand the hon. Gentleman's lack of confidence in the Conservatives' custodianship of accountability and democracy. I shall take no lectures from him or from any other Conservative Member on those issues. New clause 1 would not merely require an annual report to be submitted to the House, but would provide the opportunity for a vote on it. That would give the House a form of accountability that is not available to it now. Therefore, it would strengthen rather than weaken accountability.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): It is correct that there is no annual report, but my hon. Friend will know that under the Bank of England Act 1946, passed by a very right-wing Labour Chancellor, Hugh Dalton, the Bank of England became publicly owned, the Treasury could give instructions to the Bank of England on any matter that it wished for which accountability existed, and the bank could give instructions to any other bank that it wished —and the Treasury defined what a bank was. There could be no clearer example of governmental and parliamentary accountability for the Bank of England. Am I right in supposing that that is what the Front-Bench spokesmen wish to abandon?

5.45 pm

Mr. Smith: Later in my speech I shall deal with the 1946 Act. Indeed, I intended to quote what Hugh Dalton said on Second Reading of that Act. In the light of my right hon. Friend's characterisation of Hugh Dalton, I might reconsider that intention—but the point that I was making still stands good: the House would receive a report that it does not now receive, and would have the opportunity to vote, which it does not now have.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman's new clause refers to "ensuring compatibility of the statutes of the national central bank."

In the light of the protocol on the European Monetary Institute stage 2, let alone stage 3, is the hon. Gentleman saying that he expects section 4 of the Bank of England Act 1946 to be repealed? In other words, does he want an independent central bank in this country? If so, how does he relate that to the concession that he has already made, in that there will be no arrangements for the central bank in Europe to be accountable?

Mr. Smith: I shall deal with those issues in a moment, but it is clear to me that if the House of Commons, and Britain, want to honour the terms of the Maastricht treaty, those matters must be examined. There can be no doubt about that, but it would be premature to prejudge now precisely what form of amendment would be necessary to ensure compatibility between our statutes and the treaty.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Smith: I should like to make a little more progress, if I may.

In debating the group of amendments and, to some extent, the two groups that will follow, the Committee is engaged in that most precarious of activities against which politicians are wisely cautioned—answering hypothetical questions. That is so, because——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Smith: I shall give way in a moment.

We have to answer hypothetical questions because none of us can be sure whether the European central bank and its associated system will be established under the Bill —or rather, under the treaty—whether economic and monetary union will proceed and, if it does, whether that will happen precisely according to the timetable and provisions of the Maastricht treaty. The terms of such a move to stage 3 would in any case have to be placed before Parliament in future. Indeed, our amendment No. 35, which will be dealt with in the later group of amendments concerning European monetary union, is an attempt to set the circumstances in which that could happen.

It is interesting that the German Parliament incorporated a similar provision during its deliberations approving the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Smith: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; he has been most generous in giving way.

Surely the question is not hypothetical. It is no use saying that we shall have to consider such matters later. The treaty is specific:

"When exercising the powers and carrying out the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty and the statute of the ESCB, neither the ECB, nor a national central bank, nor any member of their decision-making bodies shall seek or take instructions from Community institutions or bodies, from any government of a Member State or from any other body."

We shall not be able to give instructions to the Bank of England on the lines of the 1946 Act. It will therefore have to be changed.

Mr. Smith: I take my hon. Friend's point, but let me repeat that what is in the Bill is conditional on certain things happening before progress towards economic and monetary union can proceed. Indeed, our amendments set further conditions to be satisfied before progress to the third stage of economic and monetary union can take place. Those amendments were designed precisely to meet the concerns expressed within the Labour party and beyond.

Mr. Rowlands: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend again, but he cannot make that case. There is a specific and clear commitment in article 14.2 of the protocol on the statutes of the bank:

"The statutes of the national central banks shall, in particular, provide that the term of office of a Governor of a national central bank shall be no less than 5 years"; and article 14.1 says that the statutes of the national bank must be "compatible with this Treaty and this Statute."

In other words, if we pass the treaty we shall bind for the future the terms and character of any national bank that we may have.

Mr. Smith: We should be binding the future of the central bank only if we proceeded to economic and monetary union, and that depends on conditions yet to be assessed by the Committee and upon which the Committee will have a further opportunity for debate.

6 pm

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman in no way seeks to mislead the Committee, but, under article 8 of the protocol relating to the European Monetary Institute, no instructions may be given or sought by the Governor of the Bank of England. If the hon. Gentleman confuses matters by continually referring to stage 3 when stage 2 contains those provisions, the Committee could be seriously misled.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not confuse the occupant of the Chair by raising points of order that are not points of order.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has not been slow to contribute to the Committee's proceedings in the past, and I am sure that he will have an opportunity later to make those points—quite possibly at some length.

As regards the United Kingdom, that conditionality arises from the treaty; from the challenges to and weaknesses within the exchange rate mechanism; and also from the Government's deliberate decision to seek to buy peace in their own ranks—unsuccessfully, as we have seen—by trying to face both ways at once, on the issue of economic and monetary union as on so much else.

Although at one level that strategy might seem quite clever, enabling us, the Government have argued, to retain a right to a voice in the shaping of the system while leaving until later any decision whether to take part in that system, at other levels it is deeply flawed. First, it leaves the Government with apparently nothing to say on the important question of the principle of participation in economic and monetary union for Europe—surely one of the most important political decisions of our times.

Secondly, the Government's very agnosticism encourages those who would see some viability in Europe developing on a multi-speed basis—a Europe of several divisions in which Britain was not in the top division. I believe that such speculation is dangerous not only for Europe but for Britain. As a consequence of the Government's economic failures, people are coming to believe that Britain is not capable of first-division status. Let me make it clear that the Labour party does not find acceptable any prospect for closer European co-operation and integration that does not have Britain firmly in the first division.

There is a real danger that some of our Community partners will finally lose patience with the Tories' two-faced foot dragging and decide that some of the Twelve should push on alone with economic and monetary union. That would be a serious blow. It would make Britain a less attractive place in which to invest, thereby jeopardising still more jobs. It would threaten Britain's position as a leading international financial centre. Most serious of all, it would once again leave the United Kingdom in the position of having at some future date to apply to join a union that others had taken the lead in establishing and has therefore had the decisive influence in shaping.

Already, with the United Kingdom opt-outs in the Maastricht treaty, Britain's inability to stay within the ERM and the underlying weakness of the British economy, the United Kingdom is being marginalised and is losing opportunities to shape important events. The Government's position on the European system of central banks and the position of the Bank of England could well reinforce those already very damaging signals, locking Britain out and depriving us of the influence that we need over the evolution of Community monetary policy. As with other aspects of the Bill, the choice facing us is not between influence through the pooling of sovereignty on the one hand and influence outside that pooling on the other; it is a choice between influence through the Community and precious little influence at all.

On the question of the status of the central banks, it is clear that the European central bank would need to be independent in its day-to-day organisations.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Why?

Mr. Smith: For reasons that I am about to explain. Without the establishment of a European Government and a European Finance Ministry—the apparatus of the European super-state to which we are not committed and to which Conservative Members who intervene from a sedentary position are wholeheartedly opposed—there is no political institution under whose day-to-day control it would be practical to place the bank, even if such a prospect were acceptable to our European partners, which plainly it is not.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): So you are going to leave it to the bankers?

Mr. Smith: Does my hon. Friend wish to intervene?

Mr. Livingstone: What my hon. Friend is saying is absolutely true. There is no political structure to oversee the bank, so the powers will go to an unelected committee of bankers—not even a committee of bankers in which each nation has a vote of equal weight. The votes are weighted to reflect GDP, so our vote will be one of the smallest per head of population in the Community. Who will take vital political decisions affecting the parity of the new European currency against the dollar and the yen and determine our interest rates? I agree with everything that my hon. Friend says, but will he now tell us whether he is happy to leave it to the bankers?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is wrong on the last point, because article 109 of the treaty specifically provides that the Council of Finance Ministers shall set exchange rates of the European currencies against currencies outside the Community and, what is more, that the decision of the Council in that respect shall be binding on the banking system. Far from the bankers having control over the politicians, as my hon. Friend suggests, it will be the other way round.

I said that there was not a political institution to exercise day-to-day control over a European central bank. The question of having and building up the role of an institution that can set the economic policy framework within which the bank has to operate—and to which, in my view, it ought to be accountable—as well as setting the external exchange rate of the Community currencies is quite another matter.

In that respect, it is important to ensure that, as a counterpart to the position of the European central bank, European economic policy co-ordination under article 103 is more effectively exercised jointly by the member states, through an enhanced role for ECOFIN. We address those matters in amendment No. 420, which falls in a subsequent group. In relation to an evaluation of the provisions of the treaty dealing with the central bank, it is important that ECOFIN should be strengthened.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): My hon. Friend is right in saying that it is the Council that will have control over the exchange rate of the ECU. The same arrangements will apply as with the Bundesbank. The Bundesbank does not control the exchange rate of the mark. That is why it allows the strange arrangement with east Germany. The Bundesbank is responsible for the internal value of the mark. The central bank would be a bank based on the model of the Bundesbank, which has an extremely large measure of independence and autonomy.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend confirms that the Bundesbank—which I agree has, to a large extent, been taken as a model for the banking arrangements in the treaty—operates within a politically determined context of economic policy. On important issues such as the exchange rate and the parity between the deutschmark and the ostmark, it was the Government and the accountable politicians whose view prevailed and not that of the bank. My point was that ECOFIN needed to be strengthened.

Mr. Benn: My hon. Friend and I and every hon. Member may well be candidates in a general election. Suppose that the arrangements go through. What can my hon. Friend say about the economic policy of his party —or any party—that could conceivably be implemented if that party were elected, given that the decisions will be taken not by elected people but by the bank and ECOFIN, which may reflect quite different opinions which could not in any way be influenced by a change of Government in any one country?

Mr. Smith: What I would say, and what I am sure the Labour party would say, is that, in government, we would be using our influence in Europe to press for co-ordinated policies for economic expansion and jobs so that the Community became an engine of recovery and not an instrument of deflation.

In returning to the question of the status of the central bank, I should make clear Labour's first key demand. It is that the European central bank must be established through public ownership and that the Bank of England must remain in public ownership. There can be no question, as some have suggested there might be, of the bank being privatised.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Smith: I must make progress.

When Hugh Dalton, the then Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved the Second Reading of the measure which nationalised the Bank of England, he said that there were two key arguments to support it. He said:

> "The first is that this Bill in effect brings the law into relation with the facts as they have gradually evolved over the years . . . The second line of argument is even more important. It is that by this Bill we ensure a smooth and efficient growth of our financial banking system in order to meet the new needs for the future"—[Official Report, 29 October 1945; Vol. 415, c. 46.]

We now best promote the needs of the Community and of the United Kingdom for an effective central banking system by holding faith with the principles that Hugh Dalton set out 48 years ago. The bank must remain in public ownership and it must be made clear, contrary to what some have supposed, that privatisation is not an option. It would be neither in the public interest nor in the interests of the effective discharge of the responsibilities of a modern central bank.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): The hon. Gentleman speaks of the need for the Bank of England to be in public ownership after the arrangements come into effect. What would be the point of the British people owning a Bank of England which would be just a provincial branch of the European central bank?

Mr. Smith: Precisely so that the body follows objectives which are in the public interest, determined within a democratically accountable political context, rather than pursuing the interests of private shareholders; and I shall say more about the legal status of the bank.

Our second key concern is with accountability, which, while it is not the same as the day-to-day control of the bank, remains important. Indeed, this examination of the issues provides us with an opportunity to take a radical look at the functions and organisation of the central banking system to ensure that they serve the people and the needs of the future.

We on the Opposition Benches have made it clear that we believe there is a strong case for examining the separation of the responsibilities that the bank has for monetary matters from its role in supervising financial institutions. Now is the time to consider going further in making the bank more accountable and representative, for example, of regional, industrial and employment needs.

Our new clause 59 called for precisely such reform of the membership of the governing council of the bank in the context of the Bill. Sadly, it has not been selected for debate. But our proposal in new clause 1, which has been selected, would be a big step forward in making the bank more accountable. There would be a report to Parliament, a debate and a vote. There would be more accountability directly to hon. Members. Further, there would be transparency in relations between the bank and the Government of the day, which would open up decision-taking in economic policy, with benefits in terms of public scrutiny and confidence.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman explained the purposes of new clause 1 and said that we would debate it and vote on it. Has he considered the position if the vote goes in favour of the new clause? What would be the result here and in Europe? What would it do for European legislation? The hon. Gentleman said that we want to be in the first division if there is a two-speed Europe. That must mean our currency being something like the franc fort, as it has been under socialist France. That has resulted in the socialists getting less than 18 per cent. of the vote in the general election there. Is that what the hon. Gentleman wants for his party in this country?

Mr. Smith: I should have thought, following President Clinton's remarks last night, that the hon. Gentleman would have hesitated before suggesting interfering in the elections of other countries. I should also have thought that a vote in this House which rejected the report of the Governor of the Bank of England or the report on the European system of central banks would be taken very seriously indeed. The hon. Gentleman should not minimise the influence that we could have via that route.

Our next area of concern is the relationship between the European central bank and the system of central banks and the politically determined framework for economic policy in the Community. In particular, we are concerned that ECOFIN should operate as a politically accountable counterpart of any European central bank. It is important to appreciate that the treaty as drafted gives ECOFIN a role in monetary policy.

For example, as I pointed out to my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), under article 109, the responsibility for exchange rate policy rests with the Council. That applies to exchange rate system agreements in relation to non-Community currencies and in the negotiation of such agreements which, as that article makes clear, are binding on the European central bank.

In the medium term, ECOFIN sets the economic framework for monetary policy, for example, through its responsibilities for the broad guidelines of economic policy and for multilateral surveillance under article 103. We want ECOFIN to be strengthened in its role and resources, and to have a permanent secretariat, a subject to which we shall return on a later group of amendments dealing with the transitional second and third stages of EMU. But in terms of monetary policy, it is clearly desirable that any European central bank should report to ECOFIN. That is the sort of issue that should be considered further when the intergovernmental conference takes place in 1996.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): My hon. Friend is placing enormous importance on ECOFIN and the powers that a revised ECOFIN might have. Why, if that is on the agenda of the European Community, have no powers been vested in ECOFIN, other than the one which the treaty mentions and my hon. Friend quoted, which is the power to decide the external exchange rate value of the ecu? Why has no other power been given to ECOFIN? Is it because all the other member states do not agree that it should be in the treaty in that way, or is it simply that my hon. Friend is indulging in wishful thinking?

Mr. Smith: I am not indulging in wishful thinking. I have argued that the powers should be strengthened, but my right hon. Friend should not underestimate the importance of the responsibilities that ECOFIN has under the treaty. As I said, those responsibilities apply not merely to the determination of the external exchange rate, important though that is for the conduct of monetary policy, but also to multilateral surveillance and the co-ordination of the economic policies of the member states. That, too, is of central importance, and we want it enhanced so as to provide effective co-ordinated European action for sustainable growth and jobs and for the realisation of the other tasks and targets for the Community as set out in article 2.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): This is my first intervention in the Maastricht debate. There is advantage in at least half the argument that the hon. Gentleman is adducing—namely, his argument in favour of a degree of statutory accountability to the House of Commons for a future central bank in this country. That would at least ensure a degree of open accountability to this Parliament, as is the case in Washington and the Federal Reserve to Congress, unlike the present position, which has lasted since the Bank of England Act 1946, with closed accountability to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day. The hon. Gentleman is right in that part of his argument.

Mr. Smith: I have said that there would be increased transparency in relations between the bank and the Government and, for that matter, between the bank and the House of Commons.

As for enhancing the powers of ECOFIN, we note that the Foreign Secretary was recently reported to be scouting around for ideas for Britain to submit to the intergovernmental conference to be held before the end of 1996. We generously donate the proposal that the powers of ECOFIN be substantially enhanced. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will carry the proposal forward and acknowledge its genesis.

In debating this matter, it is important that we do not react as a House of Commons or, more widely, as a country with the rancid conservatism of old institutions resisting change, rather than engaging constructively in the possibilities of change. As Will Hutton, the economics editor of The Guardian, said at a meeting on this subject, one of the specific difficulties which many in Britain, and especially in England, have with the concept of an independent central bank is grappling with the concept of pluralism in political and economic institutions.

We need to recognise that there can be democratically determined public institutions working within a framework of law which have an obligation to pursue defined objectives of public interest in ways which are accountable but which are free from day-to-day control of the Government, if never dissociated from their influence and the wider policy framework. If we are to progress to economic and monetary union in Europe, this is the light in which we must judge the status of the central bank and the Bank of England.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): My hon. Friend talked about the day-to-day activities of a central bank. By "day-to-day", he means the fixing of interest rates. Is he saying that it is preferable that that should be done solely by bankers or, ultimately, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister, as it is in Britain at present?

Mr. Smith: First, day-to-day control, even of short-term interest rates, will inevitably be influenced by the policy on the external value of the exchange rate, which, as the treaty makes clear, is a matter for the politically accountable ECOFIN. The second point is how much long-term freedom Britain will have to set interest rates within the context of an increasingly powerful European economic union.

If we are to progress to economic and monetary union in Europe, the light in which we must judge the status of the central bank and the Bank of England is that which recognises the possibilities of genuine pluralism within accountable institutions that serve the public interest.

The challenges before us with regard to this part of the Bill present an opportunity for reform—to make it not so much a Bank of England, but rather more a bank for Britain, just as we would expect the European central bank to serve the interests of the Community as a whole with regard to the goals of article 2 of the treaty and within a framework of democratically co-ordinated economic policy. Those are our aims. I commend new clause 1 and new clause 58 to the Committee.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I have always thought that one of the redeeming features of the Rome treaty is that it did not seek to regulate financial matters. That has permitted the enormous increase in the volume of international financial business which has taken place in the City of London during the 35 years that I have worked in those markets, and has enabled that increase to take place without being hindered in any way by Brussels.

It is difficult to believe that during the 1970s—broadly speaking, a period of great weakness for the British economy and British manufacturing industry—the Eurodollar and Euroyen markets were established in the City of London. To this day, the City of London has remained the capital of those vast markets, which earn an enormous amount of foreign exchange for the United Kingdom and give us influence in the world which perhaps we do not achieve in many other respects. It is difficult to believe that, if we had been subject to interventions from Brussels and the Commission in the 1970s and subsequently, and if a European central bank had been in place which was anxious to develop financial centres in different parts of Europe, that degree of success could have been achieved by the City of London.

The continental financial centres have always been intensely jealous of London's primacy and will certainly use the provisions of the Maastricht treaty to reduce it. Perhaps it is worth noting that, before 1973, when we entered the Common Market, we had a surplus in our trade with the then six countries of the European Economic Community which has since turned into a massive deficit. During that same period, the European financial primacy of the City of London steadily increased. The contrast is striking between the industrial position where we have been increasingly the subject of European provisions and the financial position where we have been free to pursue our traditional policies of trading with the world.

In contrast with the Rome treaty and the Single European Act, financial provisions lie at the heart of the Maastricht treaty. Its core is economic and monetary union. The engine of such union is to be the European central bank. As fiscal and monetary policies should march together in any properly conducted economic policy, economic and monetary union which is operated by a European central bank will take away from those nation states which make up the European union the freedom to issue their own currency, to choose their own interest rates, exchange rates, the level of their money supply and the level of their public expenditure and to decide the level of their own taxation.

In other words, European and monetary union will remove all the characteristics, of sovereignty which characterise a proud and independent nation, and which still to this day give to the British one of the few binding characteristics of discipline that entitle us to call ourselves a great nation. All that will be put at risk. The European central bank, together with the Commission, will have the exclusive right to exercise all the powers throughout Europe to which I have referred and the sole power to print money and control the currency which the British will use.

Effectively, the European central bank will become the most powerful economic, and therefore political, institution in the Community—indeed, in the whole free world. With 12 or more Ministers of Finance to play off against one another, any skilful president of the European central bank will be in a more powerful position that Mr. Delors has ever been. As the directors of the bank will be explicitly, deliberately and absolutely unelected, unaccountable and unassailable, I do not know what the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) meant when he said that we will have to be careful in those circumstances to ensure that the Bank of England remains in public ownership. It will not matter two hoots who owns the Bank of England or, indeed, whether there is a Bank of England in the circumstances laid down by the Maastricht treaty.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) read out article 107 on a point of order before the debate. At the risk of boring the Committee I should like again to put on the record in my speech just what article 107 says. The words of article 107 are perfectly clear. A child of 16 could understand them. I am rather bored with people telling me not to bother to take the words of the treaty seriously.

I am rather bored with Ministers, retired ambassadors and grandees in the City taking me on one side and saying in a patronising way, "Can't you be a little more sophisticated in your approach to the Maastricht treaty? We all understand that the treaty is a nonsense. It is absolutely unworkable. It will never take effect. But, my boy"—I am getting somewhat elderly to be addressed in that way, but that is the tone of voice—" if we vote against the Maastricht treaty, we shall lose all our influence in Europe. Therefore, you must vote for this ludicrous, unworkable treaty. Don't let's worry about the wording of it."

[Sir Peter Tapsell]

Ministers who sign contracts and treaties without worrying about the wording will be in some danger of being thought to have wined and dined a little too frequently with their Italian counterparts.

6.30 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): When did the hon. Gentleman last dine with an Italian Minister?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I have not dined with an Italian Minister for some months. The last time was with the then Foreign Minister of Italy, who is now being prosecuted for corruption.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I hesitate to interrupt my hon. Friend's flow, but does he agree that the warning that we shall lose influence if we do not sign up to the Maastricht treaty is exactly the same as the warning that will be given in 1997 when we refuse to sign up to the single currency, the central bank and central economic control? The same argument will hold. If we do not do it, we shall lose influence in Europe. That is not what the Government have in mind to do. There is an illogicality about their actions.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. If I might make a party political point on behalf of the Conservative party, I have never been able to understand the political thinking that, although we have theoretically opted out of the single European currency and economic and monetary union until 1996, we shall seize the nettle in 1996 on the eve of the next general election. When we do that, Lord Cardigan at Balaclava will look like a cunning strategic manoeuvrer by comparison with the Conservative party. The Whips alone will be asked to charge the guns.

Article 107 is the governing paragraph. There are an immense number of selected articles, paragraphs and protocols. I am not an expert on the treaty like many of my hon. Friends. I have been referred to several other subsections but it seems to me that article 107 is clear. It says:

"When exercising the powers and carrying out the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty and the Statute of the ESCB, neither the ECB, nor a national central bank, nor any member of their decision-making bodies shall seek or take instructions from Community institutions or bodies"——

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Shall.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Indeed, shall—

"from any government of a Member State, or from any other body. The Community institutions and bodies and the governments of the Member states undertake to respect this principle and not to seek to influence the members of the decision-making bodies of the ECB or of the national central banks in the performance of their tasks."

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leighton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I shall draw two conclusions from article 107, and then I shall give way.

First, the words seem perfectly clear. Secondly, new clause 1 and new clause 58 drive a coach and horses through article 107. With respect, I slightly differ on the new clauses we are debating from my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who made the point a few moments ago about these Labour amendments.

I shall deal with the provisions of the Federal and Reserve Board and the Bundesbank later. I am rather more familiar with them than with the treaty. However, the fact remains that we shall not be allowed to influence the European central bank in any way. Any body or individual which sought to do so could presumably be summoned before the European Court and punished by a fine.

Mr. Winnick: A few moments ago, the hon. Gentleman said that it did not make any difference whether the Bank of England existed under the proposed arrangements. Would not the same apply to the House of Commons? If such power is to be transferred, as undoubtedly it will be, what will be left to the House of Commons?

The hon. Gentleman read out article 107. Monetary policy will be decided in the way in which article 107 makes clear. The House could debate various matters in a county council way, but on major financial and monetary policies, power will have been transferred. Therefore, not merely the Bank of England but our parliamentary and democratic institutions are at stake.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who represents a part of England which I contested in my first by-election almost 40 years ago. He speaks with admirable black country good sense. May I add that one of the reasons why these debates take so long is that we all seem to prompt each other with helpful remarks. While I entirely agree with both the interventions that I have taken so far, they only delayed my speech. They echoed things that I intended to say rather less gracefully in my own speech. So if I am not to speak at inordinate length, I should be grateful to be allowed to put the anti-Maastricht case unassisted by my friends.

Mr. Leighton: I hope that I shall not take the hon. Gentleman away from his speech. He read out article 107, which says that the institutions must not seek to influence the central bank. Does he understand that to include the famous ECOFIN?

Sir Peter Tapsell: The hon. Member for Oxford, East quoted article 109. It says that the Council would have to be unanimous in acting on anything to do with the external exchange rate. I see the Financial Secretary shaking his head. I am not a lawyer. In any case, lawyers never seem to agree about anything in the treaty. If we have a single currency, it is difficult to envisage 12, 15 or 18 Finance Ministers agreeing on the correct external exchange rate for us all. In the past 18 months, we in Britain wanted a different external exchange rate from that which Germany wanted. I simply cannot envisage all the Ministers agreeing.

I shall press on with my speech now. I have quoted article 107. We are expressly forbidden by the treaty from ever seeking to influence the decisions taken by a group of unelected foreigners. Those decisions will have the most profound impact on the welfare, prosperity, employment and wealth of our constituents.

It is incomprehensible to me how the Labour party can have become sympathetic to the treaty. I have always been accused of being a left-wing Tory. I am proud of that. One of my characteristics throughout my political life has been my passionate concern to maintain the highest possible level of employment. I thought that the White Paper of 1944 which laid down a full employment policy and a target for unemployment of 3 per cent., and which was agreed by all the parties at the time, set the correct aim. It may be difficult to achieve, but it is the correct aim.

It is absolutely certain that, if we enter into the arrangements for a single central bank and a single currency, the system will be banker-dominated, and levels of unemployment throughout Europe will for ever be much higher than most of us in Britain would want to see. Those on the Labour Front Bench must understand that, in supporting the financial provisions of the Maastricht treaty, they are voting for permanent high unemployment in Britain. I am not making a party political point; it is my profound conviction that that is the certain consequence of the policy. I do not deny that it may have other advantages in terms of future inflation and so on, but I am absolutely certain that it will lead to permanent high unemployment in Britain.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there is any realistic possibility for Britain as an independent nation outside the European Community achieving the full employment that he seeks as an objective? Is he saying that the alternative is to be outside the European Community in order to have any realistic chance of achieving those objectives?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I am not suggesting that we should leave the European Community. In 1961, I voted in favour of the original application to join the Common Market. I also voted in favour of the Single European Act and the acceptance of the treaty of Rome. Our membership of the European Community is not at risk.

I am convinced that, if we remain within the Community and the single European market, we can pursue an extremely successful industrial and financial policy trading with the whole world, and that we would have a much more successful role in that position than if we were part of a European monetary and political union.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I really must get on; otherwise, I shall never finish. I have not even begun to approach the core of my speech.

Mr. Jenkin: Is my hon. Friend aware of a country which in 1966 took a negative approach towards the European Community in defence of its national interests and left an empty chair? However, since then, France has established itself very much at the heart of the European Community. I saw an article written at the time by my noble Friend Lord Lawson pointing out that we could now join the European Community, as France had left an empty chair. Although France took an anti-communautaire attitude, it subsequently established itself at the heart of the European Community.

Sir Peter Tapsell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Of course, France will always be a leading state in the European Community, as will Britain. However, France has already suffered terribly from its franc fort policies and its continued membership of the exchange rate mechanism. Last Sunday, the people of France gave a clear indication of their feelings, which they will reaffirm next Sunday. My expectation is that there will be fundamental changes in French economic policy in the months ahead.

I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary in his place, because I want to refer to our friendly exchanges on 14 January, which underline my anxieties and the differences between the declared policies of Ministers, whatever their private views may be, and the views that I express in public.

As has been echoed by the hon. Member for Oxford, East and others, hon. Members, friends and business associates around the world have often asked me why I am so concerned about an independent central bank, when the United States and Germany have independent central banks. To my astonishment, Lord Lawson was apparently a secret believer in an independent central bank. Like the Prime Minister, he was part of a silent minority. Apparently there were a lot of silent minorities in Lady Thatcher's Cabinet.

As there are independent central banks in Germany and the United States, which are clearly democratic countries, people ask me why I am concerned that we cannot do the same in Britain and Europe. I want to address that argument.

On 14 January 1993, I asked my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary:

"since, throughout our history we have never thought it right to establish an autonomous central bank, run by our own fellow countrymen, why should we now in any circumstances wish to set up an autonomous central bank run by foreigners"

My hon. Friend replied:

"If my hon. Friend . . . takes the view that in no circumstances can he contemplate a monetary authority that is not, first, combined with economic policy . . . and second, that is responsible 100 per cent. to the House, he clearly cannot in any circumstances support a single currency that circulates in 12 member states of the European Community. That is the consequences of taking such a position."

As I said at the time, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary puts matters with absolute clarity, and those words of his exactly express my position and the reasons for it.

He went on:

"It seems to me rather odd to argue that the United States or Germany . . . are any less democratic as the result of the institutions that they have chosen to establish."

I said:

"May I define what I mean by autonomous? I mean a central bank that is not democratically accountable to democratically elected Ministers answerable to a democratic assembly. So even if we had a single European currency, I would argue strongly that we need to have a single European bank that is democratically accountable and answerable—and that is what we do not have in the Maastricht treaty."

My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary replied:

"I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes, but I invite him to design a workable system for a European central bank that is politically accountable to a European political process. I do not believe that it will be easy to do".—[Official Report, 14 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 1141-42.]

That is absolutely true. It is not a question of it not being easy to establish a European central bank that is democratically accountable; it is impossible. The Financial Secretary in effect admitted that. He may wish to qualify that answer when he replies to the debate, but I congratulated him at the time on his clarity.

I should like to consider the word "independence". The present Governor of the Bank of England, for whom I have great personal regard and for whose recent personal bereavement we all feel extremely sad, said that he favoured an independent central bank, as did his nominated successor. I wonder whether they really mean what they say.

The word "independence" is often misused. The matter rests not on independence but on accountability. Real independence—that is, non-accountability to a democratically elected body or democratically chosen Ministers—is not possible in a democratic society, as my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary accepted in his reply to me on 14 January.

Let me turn first to the Fed in the United States, and examine to what extent it is really independent and unaccountable. I have had a lot to do with the Fed in the past 30 years. I have known the last four chairmen, and I think I know how the Fed works. I have been there perhaps 30 or 40 times in my life, and I have sat in on all sorts of functions there and attended congressional inquiries, and I feel that I understand how the Fed works. It bears not the smallest resemblance to the European central bank that is described in article 107, which I read out, and in all the supporting provisions of the Maastricht treaty.

In the United States of America, the Federal Reserve Board is wholly accountable to Congress. I invite Ministers to ask any governor of the Fed or any senior congressman or senator whether the Fed is accountable to Congress. The answer will be yes. The Fed was established by Congress, the law governing every activity of the Fed can be changed at any time by Congress, and the Fed remains wholly accountable to Congress. The governors of the Fed have a legal obligation to report to Congress twice a year.

That is why I do not dismiss out of hand new clause 1 and new clause 58—because, much though I dislike the entire concept, if we were to have something like these Treaty provisions, new clause 1 and new clause 58—if it could be Europeanised, as it were, and not just a British provision—would be some help towards moving the European central bank in the direction of what happens with the Fed in the United States.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I am following what my hon. Friend says with great interest. Can he just enlighten me as to whether the Fed takes direction from Congress on the conduct of monetary policy or whether it retains an independence in its day-to-day actions in that regard?

Sir Peter Tapsell: It is extremely difficult to give a one-sentence answer to that. It certainly does not take direct instructions.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Ah.

Sir Peter Tapsell: It is no good my hon. Friend saying, "Ah." Of course it does not take direct instructions like the Bank of England does. The Secretary to the Treasury in America does not stand up, as Lord Lawson, I think mistakenly, did, and announce that he has moved interest rates up or down. It always used to be announced by the Bank of England, and I think that it was a mistake when the Chancellor openly said that he was making the decisions. In any event, that does not happen with the Fed. On the other hand, in the way that I am going to explain, it is subject to tremendous and effective political pressures.

The obvious example of that was at the beginning of President Reagan's first Administration, when there was considerable divergence of opinion on monetary policy between the Fed, most of whose members had been appointed by President Carter, and President Reagan. In the end, President Reagan got his way, but there was a very open debate in the United States, and the chairman of the Fed had to appear repeatedly before Congress and be cross-examined in front of the television cameras, with the whole nation watching and with all the commentators writing. In the end, the Fed came round to accommodate the Reagan economic policies. That is roughly how it works.

I am not suggesting that the Fed takes instructions from the Secretary to the Treasury—the system in America is different—but it does not destroy my argument that the Fed——

Mr. Dykes: It does destroy the argument.

Sir Peter Tapsell: My hon. Friend says that it destroys my argument, but it does not, for reasons that I will explain. The Fed has a legal obligation to report to Congress twice a year. The report is published. The chairman of the Fed is summoned before a congressional committee and is cross-examined at length and in detail on television. These are the basic legal requirements in the United States.

In practice, the chairman of the Fed is frequently questioned by Congress, and usually in front of the television cameras—more than once a month. A former chairman of the Fed complained to me a few years ago that an excessive amount of his time throughout the year was taken up in preparing for congressional interviews and cross-examination, because he was concerned that he might inadvertently, under questioning, mislead markets as to his real intentions. He said that it was very difficult to appear for two hours before a congressional committee and say nothing, which was his intention.

So, far from the chairman of the Fed not being accountable, he is extremely accountable in all these ways, and none of this bears the smallest resemblance to the arrangements in article 107, where nobody is supposed to be allowed to bring any pressure to bear at all on the operation of the European central bank.

Mr. Forman: I am following my hon. Friend's magisterial speech as closely as I can. Is it not a fact that there is much in the arrangements that have evolved in the United States which is not only attractive in regard to what it does for genuine parliamentary accountability in this area but could provide a model for the future development of the European Community? What I have in mind is a matching of the degree of ex post accountability to the European Parliament for the European system of central banks in future with a similar, transparent accountability, again ex-post, to this Parliament for our own, more independent, central bank in this country. Will my hon. Friend accept that it could be a viable model for future development towards European monetary union?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I agree with my hon. Friend in the points that he has made. If we were to have a European central bank and European union—I am against both concepts—the Fed would be a much better model for us to take than the unworkable, totally undemocratic and unaccountable arrangements set out in the Maastricht treaty. But it is the Maastricht treaty that we are debating, after all, and we have no amendment before the Committee, suggesting that the European central bank be modelled on the Fed. I would be making a rather different speech if that were the case.

The Fed's inability to manoeuvre in exchange rate policy, even short term, is also a major constraint on its independence. The hon. Member for Oxford, East mentioned the fact that this European central bank would not have such complete powers in exchange rate policy as it would have with the internal currency. That matches the arrangements of the Bundesbank. People often point out that the Bundesbank is not as independent as it seems, because, when the two Germanies came together, Chancellor Kohl was able to override President Pöhl's well known wishes about the exchange rates between the two Marks. The same thing happened with the Anschluss in 1938 under the Reichsbank, when Hitler insisted on a much closer relationship between the Austrian schilling and the German deutschmark than the Reichsbank, under Dr. Schacht, wanted, but that is a different point.

Having no responsibility for exchange rate policy at all greatly limits the Fed's powers in the monetary sphere. As I understand the Maastricht treaty, the European central bank would have much more control over exchange rate policy than has the Fed in the United States, where it is specifically excluded from exchange rate policy.

If Congress were to decide that it did not like the way the Fed behaved, at any time it could change the law governing the Fed's activities. But the House of Commons would not be able to do that once the provisions of this treaty came into force. No doubt, if the 12 or 15, or more, nation states that made up the European union ever agreed on a change, it could be brought about, but it is quite unrealistic to suppose that this House alone would be able to make any significant changes to the working of the European central bank. So there is another great difference between the relationship of the Fed to the democratic assembly to which it is answerable and the relationship that the European central bank would later have to this House or this country, or even to the European Community.

Article 107 of the treaty would be anathema to Congress. It would be inconceivable, intolerable and unacceptable if it were to be applied to their own union of states. So why, I ask, do we think that it is acceptable for us? When the Financial Secretary asked me on 14 January why, when the United States had an independent central bank in the Federation, I was worrying about a central bank for Europe, that is the American part of my answer.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Perhaps that is one reason why the protocol states that article 107

"shall not apply to the United Kingdom."

My hon. Friend may care to reflect on that.

I totally accept that the Federal Reserve Board is accountable to Congress, which treats it in just the way that he describes. However, I think he gave the Committee the impression that there was a glorious period for most of our history when we were totally independent—we had our own way of fixing our currency and were independent of any other country. May I remind him that we were members of the Bretton Woods agreement and were wholly dependent on the United States dollar and the Federal Reserve, and had no independence of any kind?

Sir Peter Tapsell: On the first of my hon. Friend's two points, I accept that, because of the opt-out aspect of the protocol that he referred to, we are not governed by that article. As he will know, however, we have to seize that nettle in 1996. Earlier, I pointed out the great political disadvantages if the Conservative party has to go through all these appallingly divisive arguments again on the eve of the next general election. To contemplate doing so would seem to be madness in party political terms, but that is what we are doing by putting off the decision until 1996. That is one reason why I have thrown in my lot completely with the anti-Maastricht group. It is better to get the argument out of the way now, in the first year of this Parliament, than to go through it all again in its last year.

On the question of how independent Britain has ever been, obviously its independence has varied enormously. Prior to Napoleon's Berlin decree codifying the continental system, people were telling Pitt that he had lost independent control of the British currency. It is true that, under Bretton Woods, because of the acute dollar shortage after we had sold our assets all over the world to pay for the war, we were to a large extent in tutelage to the United States, but we escaped it. My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Horden) suggests that we should now put ourselves in tutelage to the Bundesbank and the German mark, in replacement of the United States currency. I have the highest regard for the United States, but I do not wish us to be one of its colonies; nor do I wish us to live in a German colony.

Everyone talks as though the Bundesbank were such a marvellous organisation that we all ought to model our banks on it. Indeed, I understand that other European countries, such as France, Portugal and Spain, are busy rewriting the provisions for their central banks, with the help of Bundesbank officials, to model them on Bundesbank lines.

One of the things to remember about the Bundesbank, as it is presently constituted, is that it is far more accountable—in the best sense of the word—than the proposed European central bank. Earlier I described what I meant by independence. The Bundesbank is much more accountable than most people realise. For instance, the German Minister of Finance always attends its board meetings, and although he does not have a vote at its council meetings, he is permitted to speak.

I understand from German friends who have held the position that the Minister of the day often speaks at length and with great force at such meetings. He also has the constitutional right to propose motions, although he cannot vote on them, and he can request that the delay of a decision by two weeks. All those are important aspects of accountability, which are built into the Bundesbank's provisions and there are other more technical arrangements, but I shall not weary the House with those.

None of that accountability is written into the Maastricht treaty for a European central bank and there is not even a suggestion that the President of the Council of Finance Ministers can attend its meetings, address it, ask it to do this or that, or to delay a decision for a fortnight. If one is to believe article 107, the bank will not be accountable to anyone.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): Another important difference between the Bundesbank and the European central bank is that the former works with the grain of German public opinion, but a European central bank will not be answerable to any public opinion, because there is no European public opinion as such.

[Mr. Barry Legg]

Sir Peter Tapsell: Yes, the latter part of my hon. Friend's comments is true, but I would not presume to comment on the extent to which the Bundesbank operates with the grain of German public opinion. A number of leading German industrialists have been critical of its monetary policies during the past 18 months. The chairman of Deutsche Bank has publicly criticised it, so there is no unanimity, in Germany even, about the wisdom of the Bundesbank's monetary policies. There is no doubt that, for historic reasons, the Bundesbank enjoys enormous prestige in Germany, but that does not mean that it commands universal support for all that it does.

Directors from the German regional central banks outnumber the Bundesbank's directors. The appointment of regional directors has a strong political element, and they feel politically beholden to the people who have appointed them, who are the Mayor Daleys of the German provinces. I do not know any German, but I think that they are called the länder—as most of them are borrowers, I find that confusing. The regional directors are expected to champion the economic interests of their region, and they do so.

As the Chancellor of the Exchequer discovered to his dismay before 16 September, on their way to Frankfurt to attend meetings, the regional directors give little press conferences designed to show their local Bavarian newspaper or wherever what good chaps they are. This may not help the Finance Minister of another country who is desperately trying to protect the parity of his currency. Nevertheless, that is an example of the fact that the Bundesbank is a good deal more accountable than it appears on the surface.

The central bank that I know best is the Bank of Japan, although it is not often mentioned. The Japanese economy has been rather a success story—although it is going through a difficult patch—during the past 25 years, but we hardly ever hear the Bank of Japan quoted as an example for us to model ourselves on. That bank is wholly subordinate to the Japanese Government. The present governor of the Bank of Japan is a distinguished former Treasury official, and he does exactly what the Japanese Cabinet tells him to do. So there is no proof that independence and non-accountability alone or necessarily produce great economic success.

King William III, who was a Dutchman—perhaps the Dutch have a flair for that sort of thing—established our central bank to be independent but accountable, and to be run by our fellow countrymen. Ten of the 11 other member states have always followed suit and have had accountable central banks.

We are told that the Chancellor sings in his bath, but I have less operatic tendencies when I am in my bath. Sometimes I lie there and wonder how we can be prepared to hand over the control of our central bank to a group of foreigners under German domination. I wonder what King William III would have thought about that when he drew up the original charter for the Bank of England

"to promote the public good and well-being of our people"— of our people. We may be sure that the Bundesbank will never allow a European central bank to manage and issue a single currency which, whatever its name, is anything but the deutschmark in disguise. That is a political and economic fact of life. Nor do I blame it for that. If I were German I should certainly hold that view.

Would any German banker in his senses, or, for that matter, any German citizen or saver, want to have the value of his money—his savings and his wages—determined by a secret compromise with the Greek, Italian and Portuguese directors of the European central bank, whose main interest in the Community is to receive handouts from the richer countries and to protect themselves from their own politicians, for whom they have the utmost contempt? To anybody who has ever moved in the real banking world, the idea is absolutely preposterous. With the great influence of the Whips Office, it is certain that, if the Maastricht provisions for a central bank ever come into force, they will rapidly prove to be totally unworkable.

The history of ideas is always significant and worthy of study. As a boy, I trained as an historian, and reading history has always been my main hobby. When one is told that there is nothing so irresistible as an idea whose time has come—which is what people say, or used to say, about European monetary union—I like to think about the history of the idea. We have all read Marx and Engels —at least, Conservative Members have—and we have all wondered how different the Communist utopia would have been if the first Communist revolution had occurred in some country other than Russia. Chinese leaders have made this point to me. Marx clearly hoped that it would occur in Germany. Thankfully for all of us, it did not.

We ought to reflect where the idea of European monetary union originated. The more idealistic souls among us seem to suppose that European monetary union was the brainchild of that nice M. Jean Monnet. In fact, it was the brainchild of the rather less nice Herr Walther Funk.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making an excellent speech, but he is straying from the subject of the debate. [SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Order. The Chair says that the hon. Gentleman is straying.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I shall come straight back to order, Mr. Lofthouse.

The First Deputy Chairman: I shall be very grateful.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Herr Walther Funk was the president of the Reichsbank, the predecessor of the Bundesbank, from 1939 to 1945. My point is that Funk originated the whole concept of European monetary union, which is what we are debating. Surely, therefore, I am very much in order.

European monetary union was not dreamed up by M. Jean Monnet, an idealistic European; the idea was floated in July 1940 by Walther Funk, who was a drunken, homosexual Nazi toady and was subsequently sentenced to life imprisonment by the Nuremberg tribunal. In July 1940, just after the German panzer divisions had overrun western Europe, Funk circulated a number of documents on European monetary union. These are all set out in the recently published excellent book "The History of the Bundesbank" by the distinguished financial journalist

David Marsh. I shall not quote at length, but I have to say that the wording of the Maastricht treaty in certain sections follows almost word for word the documents circulated inside the Reichsbank in 1940. The view, which Hitler strongly shared, was that Europe could not be held permanently subordinate to Germany by force of arms alone, that it was necessary to resort to economic and monetary forces to make the domination permanent.

Mr. David Marsh, at pages 132-3 of his book, says:

"As the Wehrmacht rampaged across Europe, the success of the blitzkreig convinced the Reichsbank, like many others, that the fighting would soon be over. The central bank and the Reich economics Ministry, under Goering, actively laid plans for post-war monetary union across a large part of Europe with the Reich mark as the dominant currency. In June 1940 the Reichsbank economics and statistics department prepared a detailed analysis for Funk and the rest of the directorate, looking ahead to problems for external monetary policy after the end of the war . . .

In fact, by July 1940, the Reich economics Ministry had already drawn up detailed plans for a bank of European settlements, to be called the Bank of Europe, as the pivot of the planned post-war monetary system. Countries eligible for participation in the proposed central European economic union included the Netherlands, Denmark, Slovakia, Romania, Bulgaria and Hungary. The Reich economics Ministry suggested that Belgium, Norway and Sweden could also become associated. Special arrangements would have to be made in a future peace treaty with Britain and France in order to secure the economic recovery of central Europe."

Sir Ivan Lawrence: The opt-out.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Exactly.

David Marsh's book continues:

"Initial plans were thus based on individual countries' maintaining their own currencies but agreeing to permanently fixed exchange rates against the Reichsmark."

That is the ERM. It has all happened before.

I should like now to turn to the question of who first established an independent and unaccountable central bank. It was not, as many people think, Bismarck in 1870. On the contrary, Bismarck took the view that bankers should not be entrusted with political power, that they would always produce mass unemployment. He made sure, when he set up the Reichsbank in 1870, that it was totally subject to political control—not very democratic political control, but his control.

In 1923—just after Germany, for the first time ever, became a democracy in the shape of the Weimar republic—a gentleman called Dr. Schacht decided that it would not be a good thing for the Reichsbank to be subject to democratically elected politicians. He managed to persuade the Weimar republic in 1923 to set up an independent and unaccountable Reichsbank—the predecessor of the Bundesbank.

Of course, some of our fellow countrymen share Dr. Schacht's distrust of elected politicians. I am afraid that there are many such people in the City of London and in the boardrooms of British industry, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer will discover when he looks for a commercial job. Many people do not admire politicians. It is worth recalling that, when Hitler was elected to power in 1933, the already independent and unaccountable Reichsbank, far from proving a bulwark against irresponsible political adventurism—one of the arguments is that unaccountability and independence provide a barrier against political adventurism—immediately became, under Dr. Schacht's presidency, a slavish and most helpful tool of Nazi tyranny.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): My hon. Friend's account of the origins of European monetary union is most entertaining, but it is, surely, completely inaccurate. The first European monetary union, which was not a theory, but happened and went beyond Europe, was the creation of the gold standard.

Sir Peter Tapsell: That was not confined to Europe. The gold standard had one great merit: sterling was the anchor currency. If one's currency happens to be the anchor currency, marvellous ideas for monetary union based upon it become quite attractive. The sterling area was attractive when we were the anchor currency; the Bretton Wood agreement was attractive to the United States while the dollar was the anchor currency—although President Nixon left the agreement pretty smartly in 1971 when he found that the dollar was no longer the anchor currency. We would not be the anchor currency in a European monetary union: the Bundesbank and the German mark would provide the anchor currency. Our interests would be subordinated to German interests, as they were while we were members of the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend said that the German mark would be the anchor currency if there were monetary union. But under the proposals in the treaty, the German mark would fall. If it no longer existed as a currency, how could it become the anchor currency?

Sir Peter Tapsell: As I said earlier, if we had a single currency, whether we called it the ecu or anything else, it would be the deutschmark under a different name, because Germany is the dominant economy. It is precisely because people admire the way in which the Bundesbank has run its monetary affairs in recent years that they want a European central bank. They think that that bank will be modelled on, and undoubtedly dominated by, the Bundesbank.

The Reichsbank was unaccountable and showed no independence. It did not seek to emulate the Fed in the United States of America, which caused so much trouble to Franklin D. Roosevelt in his first years. By contrast, the Reichsbank overnight became Hitler's creature and provided him with the sinews of war.

People should not be under the illusion that an unaccountable central bank will show a degree of political independence, integrity and liberalism when faced with ruthless and corrupt politicians. History does not suggest that. Far from being a source of weakness to great institutions, their accountability to democratically elected bodies elsewhere is ultimately an essential source of strength to those institutions and those who lead them. Under the Maastricht treaty, no effective accountability will exist—or could exist—as the Financial Secretary recognised in his reply to me on 14 January, which I have already quoted.

Until now, I have made largely economic and banking comments, but I shall now draw some political conclusions. With the loss of ultimate parliamentary control over the central bank, the House will lose the rock on which it was founded and built: control over the money supply. Our constituents will effectively be disfranchised. Those hon. Members who vote for article 107, and its related articles and protocols, will effectively be echoing Cromwell's words when he pointed at the Mace and said, "Take that bauble away."

When I first entered the House, 34 years ago, there were still a considerable number of hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, who had sat in the Chamber throughout all the debates on Neville Chamberlain's appeasement policies. I never spoke to one such Member who could recall in his heart ever having been a supporter of those policies. I sometimes used to wonder whether the Munich agreement had been carried single-handed by Neville Chamberlain and the Conservative Whips Office.

Before I entered the House, when I was personal assistant to Anthony Eden, the then Prime Minister, Walter Elliot—a distinguished Member of the House who had been here in the 1930s and who voted for the Munich agreement—told me in a private conversation, which I feel able to repeat as he has been dead for many years, that he voted in favour of Munich out of a sense of personal loyalty to Neville Chamberlain. He said that he admired Chamberlain as a man, and felt that he had done a good job domestically. Walter Elliot said that voting for Munich had not only eventually wrecked his own political career but, more importantly, had damaged his self-esteem. He said that he had never ceased to reproach himself for that vote as events unfolded.

I ask my younger hon. Friends, who have not been long in the House, have long careers ahead of them and know in their hearts that the Maastricht treaty is not right for Britain, to remember Walter Elliot. I predict that, 10 years from now, there will be very few Tory Members of Parliament who will easily recall that they were ever supporters of the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Benn: We have listened to a speech of exceptional interest from an hon. Gentleman who knows the banking world very well. The account of the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) of the history of banking, and the relationship of the Bundesbank and the Fed to their Governments, and of the Bank of England to the British Government, merits an enormous amount of study.

I wish that the press were not honouring our debates by their absence. But the newspapers are part of the Greek chorus to which the hon. Gentleman referred at the end of his speech. It is generally assumed by everyone that the Maastricht treaty will be passed, so our debates are a complete waste of time. I find myself in a weird position, as my Front-Bench colleagues are passionately pro-Maastricht. All that has ever been attempted by the Opposition are little procedural tricks to embarrass the Government on a closure motion or something of that sort. We hear no criticism of substance from the Labour Front-Bench team of the Maastricht treaty.

People outside the House are not foolish and they know what is going on. They know of the great cheering when we succeed in voting to go home at 10 pm—but our activities have no substantive effect. The Conservative and Liberal Front Benches are together on the treaty and those of us who hold a different view are publicly presented as a little group of old-fashioned fuddy-duddies who would like to live in the past.

The reality is that the central bank is at the core of the political question that we are discussing. We are not really discussing economics, although I appreciate that that issue has considerable implications. We are discussing where political power will rest, because the bank will have the ultimate right to determine the shape of the budget, which determines the amount of public expenditure allowed.

Nobody has mentioned the fact that the central bank will wipe out the social chapter. If a Labour Government who favoured the social chapter were elected and wanted to spend more money—they might even wish to adopt the social chapter—the central bank would say no. It would say that, if to do so meant borrowing more than 3 per cent. of the gross national product, the Government would not be allowed to do it—there is a self-cancelling element.

The role of 3 per cent. is an interesting one. I recall the publication of the Beveridge report when I was a student about 50 years ago. It set 3 per cent. as the maximum tolerable level of unemployment. We are now moving towards monetarist days when 3 per cent. is to be the maximum public borrowing, which will condemn us to high unemployment levels for ever.

The importance of the debate is that all the Front Bench teams agree. All the parties represented in the House are abandoning their separate traditions. I cannot speak with authority on the basis of Conservative thinking over the years, nor would I wish to do so. My understanding was that it was about a Britain strong and free. That was the title of a Conservative election manifesto which I have a home in my archives. It shows a picture of a great lion in Trafalgar square and it has the slogan "Britain strong and free". It is a Britain weak and governed by a central bank which is on the agenda now.

7.30 pm

Hon. Members may persuade the electorate or the BBC or John Birt by some special financial arrangement that it is about something else, but they should not try to kid people who have been here long enough to know otherwise. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were committing an offence if he tried to influence the central bank, which is what the treaty says, how can that possibly be the maintenance of an independent nation?

I am not a nationalist. My history does not lead me to the view that a strong pound and, as somebody said about nuclear weapons, the best-defended dole queues in the world, are the main national duties. However, I have interpreted the Conservative party to take that view and it has been completely undermined by Maastricht.

The Liberal party used to believe in free trade: that is what it was all about. My father was elected as a Liberal Member of Parliament in 1906, but sensibly joined the Labour party in the 1920s just after I was born. It took me a year or two to persuade him to make the transfer and he joined the Labour party in 1927. Now the Liberal party is voting for the most highly protected arrangement one could imagine. It has abandoned its faith.

I now come to my own party. However difficult it is for me to do so, I share the view of the hon. Member for East Lindsey about the importance of history, because, if we do not know where we have come from, we do not know where we are and are therefore not quite sure where to go. My reading of what I would call the progressive political tradition in Britain is that it was the ordinary common people who had no vote but wanted one so that they could use it to influence the conditions of life under which they lived. Through the ballot box they could elect a Government who would at least act as a countervailing power to the power of the landowners and capital.

That has been wholly and completely abandoned by the Front Bench spokesman of my party. It is not that socialism has been abandoned, because that went years ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) says that we should abandon clause 4. I am waiting for him to say that the archbishop should abandon the 10 commandments on the ground that adultery is so widespread that one could not hope to build a Church on the basis of excluding it.

However, that is not the issue. The issue is that, 100 years ago, when Keir Hardie was elected to Parliament, the principle upon which he built his support was that it was possible for people who did not own banks or have personal wealth to band together into trade unions and promote a party that would use the ballot box to contain, control and redirect the power of capital.

Mr. Forman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would allow me to finish. I am trying to develop a theoretical argument that needs to be considered and I hope that I am not being provocative. Labour's Front-Bench Members are abandoning their belief in democracy.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Benn: No, I intend to develop this point. My hon. Friend will have plenty of opportunities for sound bites. I am putting an argument.

Mr. Mandelson: My right hon. Friend has referred to me. Will he give way?

Mr. Benn: No, I shall not give way.

I am putting a serious argument which I feel deeply. It is that the ballot box is important because it does what I have described in many ways. When a Liberal Government repealed the Taff Vale judgment and allowed trade unions to play a role that the previous Conservative Government had prohibited, they were legislating for a countervailing power against capital. That was greatly to their credit. In many respects the Liberal Government of 1906 were far more progressive than my party today because they carried through much more radical taxation changes and legislated for public ownership of the London docks.

People may agree or disagree with what has been done during this century, but its history shows that trade unionism with a political voice gave people power over their economy which they did not have when they did not have the vote. That was why people wanted the vote. The chartists and the suffragettes were not trying to obtain an A-level in English history or English government. Women wanted power so that Parliament would have to listen and pay attention to women's interests, and those interests were reflected in a minimum wage, in Sunday shopping regulations and in other ways. I fear that that is what my party has abandoned.

Mr. Betts: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Benn: My hon. Friend who is trying to intervene asked what hope Britain had of dealing with unemployment. He said it with deep pessimism. My complaint is not that there is a viciousness in Labour Front-Bench Members, but that there is a deep and absolutely unnecessary pessimism. I am on the national executive of the party and I am not trying to be controversial but simply putting a point of view. The party of which I am a member now believes that nothing at all can be done about unemployment because of the power of international capital. I dispute that, because, if it is difficult now, it was difficult for Keir Hardie.

Mr. Andrew Smith: My right hon. Friend has described the history of democratic socialism as the attempt by people to gain control of the economic forces that shape their lives. Now that capital and the economic system are clearly organised on a European basis, does not that mean that if we are to exercise democratic power in the interests of working people we must do it in conjunction with our European neighbours? As our conference resolutions and policies make clear, the European Community and the Maastricht treaty are the best available means to do that.

Mr. Benn: That is the core of the argument. In its manifesto last March the Labour party endorsed the Maastricht treaty even though it had not been negotiated at the time of the previous conference. There was no conference legitimacy for the manifesto. I said in Chesterfield that I was opposed to it. We are not arguing about nationalism versus internationalism: we are on a wholly different issue. International capital is not controlled by handing it over to the archbishop and bishops of international capital—the independent central bankers.

Listening to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench and my other passionate, modernising colleagues is like listening to the maharajahs at the time of the Raj in India who said, "Look, Queen Victoria is here. You must live with her and you will have more influence if you pick up a knighthood from Buckingham palace and go to the coronation than if you follow this silly Nehru-Gandhi stunt of trying to run our own land."

Mr. Betts: I am still trying to discover my right hon. Friend's realistic alternative in the current situation. He seems to be arguing that we should not be pursuing economic and monetary union as described in the treaty and that we should opt out of our arrangements with the Community. He seems to say that the alternative is simply to retain parliamentary sovereignty and ignore our arrangements with our colleague countries in the Community and that by doing so we can deliver for our people full employment and all the other benefits that he and I want to see. Are those realistic alternatives?

Mr. Benn: My hon. Friend with his clarity of mind has confirmed his pessimism. He had distinguished service on Sheffield city council and honestly believes that Sheffield can do nothing within the context of Britain and that Britain can do nothing outside the context of the Maastricht arrangement. No one should think that Maastricht will liberate us from world market forces because the ecu could go up and down according to the gambling that might occur with the yen and the dollar. I challenge my hon. Friend's pessimism.

If I accepted it I would never stand for Parliament again because I would have to go to the people of Chesterfield, as I shall have to do if this goes through, and say, "You can vote for whoever you like, but I must tell you honestly and frankly that if you vote for me I cannot do a thing about improving the prospects here because my party has agreed to hand over all the powers not to Parliament but to an independent European bank."

Mr. Forman: The right hon. Gentleman's essential thesis seems to be that power in the modern world emerges, as at the time of Keir Hardie, from the vaults of a bank. In this case, he talks about the power of a possible European central bank. The right hon. Gentleman argues that countervailing political power is needed to lean against that. Does he not realise the impeccable logic of the French case, which is that a political counterbalance is needed against the emerging system of a European central bank and that that should be achieved within the framework of the arrangements proposed by the French to bind the Germans and everyone else?

Mr. Benn: The French socialist party has destroyed itself by following the policy advocated by members of my Front Bench. It has absolutely obliterated itself—although temporarily, not in the longer term.

I was at first against the European Community and wrote an article in Encounter to that effect in 1964. Then, some of the pessimism that I described today overcame me in the 1964 Labour Government. I thought, "This is the way to deal with multinational capital," and favoured our application. Later, I served in the Community, as a member of the Council of Ministers. I came to realise that the European Community is the instrument of multinational capital, to ensure that there is no democratic challenge to the power of international capital. Those who live under the illusion that Brussels and the bankers are our friends against multinational and international financiers are living in a complete dream world.

This may be controversial, but I am bound to say that, for the moment, many of my hon. Friends think that capital should be free to move wherever it likes. They agree that labour should be constrained. Consider the control over labour that exists in Britain compared with the freedom of capital.

This might not appeal to Conservative Members—or they may like it. Paul Johnson has an article in The Daily Mail today saying that the police and the Government have enough firepower to gun down Scargill, Bickerstaffe, and so on, if there is trouble on 2 April. Compare the £10 billion made by speculators on the day that we left the ERM with the fines and sequestration imposed on trade unions if they interfere with production for one day without balloting. That is something that my hon. Friends endorse, too, because it is part of the system that labour should be constrained and capital liberated. Then we tell the populace, "Don't worry—Brussels is the means by which we can control international capital." That is not at all true.

I am trying to chronicle as best I can the nature of the decision that I fear that the House will take. I favoured a referendum in 1968 and still do. The Labour party was not very keen. I was in a minority of one on its national executive and shadow Cabinet, but Wilson came round in the end and we had a referendum. I dare say that, in one way or another, the Conservative party will come around to a referendum, too. But members of my Front Bench are also opposed to a referendum. They do not want the people to have a say. They are absolutely solid in joining the Government in denying the people the right to have the sort of fascinating, important, historic and fundamental debate that we are allowed tonight.

If the House voted by secret ballot on the Maastricht treaty, it would be defeated, because it would not be known to whom to deny a peerage, put on the Front Bench, allow to attend royal garden parties at Buckingham palace, or reward by the corrupt patronage system—even as revamped by the Prime Minister.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. How does that relate to the amendment under consideration?

Mr. Benn: I will say, as a right hon. or hon. Member always does when called to order, that that was a very helpful point to make, Dame Janet.

This huge issue wipes out centuries of Conservative and Labour tradition—the Conservatives defending the national interests of the nation—I am not a nationalist—and Labour defining the power of the ballot box to change our destiny.

The consequence will be riot. As I suppose that we will lose the vote on Third Reading, I will prepare myself for the next stage. All that will happen is that I shall be catapulted back 100 years, to a Parliament that is not democratic and a time in which women do not have the vote. How does one live in a 19th-century Parliament, in an era when riot is used to change the law? French farmers and French fishermen are rioting already and some British fishermen are beginning to get the message that, if they want to catch the really big fish in the form of the Cabinet, they had better riot. That will happen because people will not accept unjust laws.

If I cannot influence the outcome of the vote on Third Reading—and I am realistic enough to accept that I cannot—I am determined to leave in Hansard an explanation of what happened and why. Pessimism, defeatism, and the failure to represent the people whom we were elected to serve is what happened. If I were not such a moderate man, I would call it a massive betrayal by Parliament of the people who put us here, but I do not know that I want to use the word "betrayal", because it is more a collapse of our self-confidence.

How is history to be made other than by people who have confidence in their own society and institutions and in their capacity to advance them? The so-called modernisers in the Labour party are taking us back to Victorian England. They are not modernisers but Victorian liberals. They believe in market forces and the Manchester school of economics. They do not like the unions very much. They do not believe in socialism. They want the ins and outs of the Tory-Liberal game of the 19th century—well before the Labour party was founded. That cannot be done, because the circumstances of our time will not allow it.

We have chronic mass unemployment and chronic mass youth unemployment, and people will not accept that. I do not know when the expression of anger will come. It may come on 2 April, with unexpected events. Something quite surprising could trigger it off—but if, when that anger comes, it cannot effectively be represented through the Labour party in Parliament, people will find other ways of expressing it. I fear that because I believe in this place. I may be an idealist even to believe in Parliament, but when I was elected I was told that the great thing about Parliament was that it controlled the purse and the sword. That was the great 17th-century gain, but today we do not control the purse.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): The right hon. Gentleman spoke of lack of confidence in ourselves. Is not there some inconsistency in his argument in respect of a referendum? Would not a referendum be the ultimate proof of lack of confidence in this place?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Before the right hon. Gentleman continues, I remind him that the amendments under consideration concern banking. The right hon. Gentleman is, in effect, making a Second Reading speech, if not one that goes wider.

Mr. Benn: If banking lies at the heart of the treaty—as it does—you, Dame Janet, will forgive me for drawing attention to its importance.

The Prime Minister supports Boris Yeltsin's referendum, but not a referendum for us. There must be some logic. These big questions are not being considered under parliamentary democracy but are being dealt with under the discipline of the Whips on both sides of the Committee, using all sorts of weapons at their disposal. These questions are not being decided on a free vote of Parliament. At my age that does not affect me, because I do not want anything. They cannot do much to me if I want to speak my mind—but it is disrespectful to the people who put us here to take away the power they lent us and to give it to bankers whom they cannot remove. That is the argument in a nutshell.

I hope that the public have the chance of reading something of the speech of the hon. Member for East Lindsey and of this debate, to understand the enormity of what is being done here and the unanimous betrayal of all the traditions of the three parties by following this route.

Mr. Butterfill: I have the somewhat unenviable task of following two extraordinarily eloquent speakers—the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who is probably the most eloquent and entertaining speaker left in the House, and my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), whose expertise in banking matters is probably unrivalled in the House of Commons. The position in which I find myself is especially unenviable, for I disagree with much of what both of them have said.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey for explaining in such detail the constraints, and the checks and balances that exist in regard to the Bundesbank and the Federal Reserve Board. My hon. Friend carefully explained that the Federal Reserve Board is accountable to Congress. He also pointed out that it did not control the bank's day-to-day monetary decisions. That was an important clarification, but—perhaps even more importantly—he made it clear that even the Federal Reserve Board, with its renowned independence of view, was subject to pressure from the executive: not from Congress, but from the presidency. That, surely, is rather extraordinary. No one suggests that the President has any authority over the bank, and, indeed, it is not accountable to the executive; it is accountable to Congress.

Sir Peter Tapsell: First, I said that the Federal Reserve Board was subject to pressure from both Congress and the President. Secondly, given that the President appoints the board's governors when vacancies occur, he cannot be said to have no influence.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's helpful intervention. I was not suggesting that the President had no influence; I was suggesting that the board was not accountable to him. Of course, influence is exerted in all these matters—and whoever appoints a central banker, under whatever system, will naturally have influence as a result of his power to appoint. However, it was the accountability point that my hon. Friend was addressing.

Similarly, my hon. Friend explained the independence of the Bundesbank and the element of accountability in that system, but went on to concede that, in the face of the political realities dictated by the unification of Germany, the political will of the people eventually prevailed over the wishes of the Bundesbank, which was forced reluctantly to allow a one-for-one parity between the deutschmark and the ostmark—for which the German people and, indeed, the rest of Europe have subsequently had to pay a considerable price.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I was trying to make the point that the Bundesbank is specifically excluded from interfering with the exchange rate. Chancellor Kohl was entirely within his constitutional rights in making his decision about the parity between the ostmark and the deutschmark. President Pöhl could only give his advice in private: the Bundesbank has no constitutional control over the exchange rate.

Mr. Butterfill: Again, I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He will know that the subsequent conduct of monetary policy has been the subject of considerable tension between the Government and the Bundesbank, and that great pressure has been put on the bank, to some of which it has yielded. My hon. Friend's suggestion that independent central banks cannot be politically accountable is not borne out by the facts. Clearly, whatever system is set up to try to give such banks independence, they will all ultimately be susceptible to political pressures from whichever political institution happens to be in place. I believe that the same would apply to a European central bank, although the pressures would come from a different quarter.

Even today, with our new-found freedom conferred by a floating currency, we see in the newspapers questions such as, "Will the Germans reduce their discount rate, and will that enable our Chancellor to reduce our interest rates still further?" It is not true to say that we retain true independence of action; even with that new-found freedom, we are still bound by our relationships with other currencies. Given that Germany is our largest single trading partner, it is clear that we are very much bound up with what happens in Germany, and very much influenced by the power of the deutschmark.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Surely my hon. Friend recalls the events of last summer, when our Government consistently told us that, if we left the exchange rate mechanism, our interest rate must inevitably rise. What happened? The day after black Wednesday, interest rates went down. How can my hon. Friend possibly maintain his theory in the light of those real and practical events?

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): The exchange rate went down as well.

Mr. Butterfill: I was intending to turn shortly to the events referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), but I agree with the sedentary observation made by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor).

Sir Teddy Taylor: What was wrong with that?

Mr. Butterfill: I am not suggesting that anything was wrong with it.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Butterfill: May I answer my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow first? If I give way too often, I may become rather confused about which question I am answering, and where I have got to in my speech. I shall try not to be waylaid too frequently.

We made a political decision to reduce the exchange rate, and we took a gamble on the effect that that might have on inflation. Given that we were in a considerable recession, that appears to have been a wise decision. My point is that, although our currency is notionally free and floating, we are still influenced by what happens in Germany, and must inevitably continue to be influenced by our trading relations.

Mr. Winnick: No one is suggesting for a moment that we can act in total isolation from other currencies; that has never been part of the argument. Does the hon. Gentleman accept, however, that part of the argument that he and others are advancing about the ratification of the treaty and the European central bank is very similar to the argument of those who were so keen for Britain to join the ERM—which, indeed, was the conventional wisdom of the time? It was said then that we could not act in isolation, that joining was inevitable and that those who opposed it —as I certainly did—were living in the past. Yet our ERM membership was a disaster, which cost a great deal in British manufacturing jobs. It is now recognised that at least part of the reason for our high unemployment rate was our ERM membership. Thank heaven we are now out of it.

Mr. Butterfill: I had hoped to deal with the hon. Gentleman's argument later. He is right to say that the ERM was profoundly damaging to us, as it was constituted when we were part of it. What was damaging about it was that the Germany Government were reluctant to fund the unification costs through taxation—although they briefly tried to introduce a 7·5 per cent. special levy, which proved politically unacceptable. They lost a good many seats in the länder elections as a result. Under the German system, which imposes on the Bundesbank a statutory duty to prevent inflation, the only alternative to funding that enormous level of expenditure was to increase interest rates. That is what went wrong.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Butterfill: I should like to get on, if I may.

I do not think that any of us anticipated the events that would arise out of the unification of Germany. Indeed, I do not think that many hon. Members anticipated the unification itself, still less the strains that it would impose on the economy.

Mr. Mitchell rose——

Mr. Butterfill: I must develop my argument. I have given way several times. The hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to make his own speech if he can catch your eye later, Dame Janet.

The statutory duty of the Bundesbank to increase interest rates and to have regard only to what is happening in the German domestic economy caused the strains within the exchange rate mechanism and was the fatal flaw within that mechanism. It produced fundamental instability in a system designed to promote stability. We shall achieve stability only if, within a future exchange rate mechanism, the participating central banks have a duty to support the operation of that mechanism rather than a narrow duty to look after their own national interests. That has not yet been fully recognised, but I believe that it is an essential prerequisite to the successful operation of a mechanism.

Indeed, the very weakness of the mechanism reveals the need either to have a system of freely floating currencies, which we have now, and which will be influenced by a dominant currency—as my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey said, it would be dominated by the deutschmark—or to merge all the currencies into a single currency, which would overcome my hon. Friend's fear.

Under the proposed system, the Bundesbank would represent but one equal vote in the operation of a central bank and would to a large extent be giving up its control of what happens in the European economy. That is recognised in Germany where there is now considerable resistance in many quarters to the very idea of giving up the power that it has through the present operations of the market. It therefore seems that we have a great deal to gain, and certainly nothing to fear from German domination, under the system proposed in the treaty.

Indeed, if we were to move quickly to currency union, we should all gain a great deal more influence over our own affairs than we have at the moment. However, I do not think that that utopia will come about for a considerable time, because the convergence criteria are not likely to be achieved in anything like the forseeable future. I do not agree with the proposal that the price that we should all have to pay should be to have cohesion funds to transfer huge sums of money from the wealthier northern countries of Europe to the supplicants in the south. The suggestion that that would be politically acceptable to the countries of the north is pie in the sky. It does not happen even in federal states such as the United States of America, where there is only a limited transfer from the wealthier to the poorer states.

Mr. Legg: Does my right hon. Friend realise that, when there is an independent European central bank, there will be one interest rate for the whole of Europe? Germany, Italy, Spain and the United Kingdom will have one interest rate. There will be no question of having easier monetary conditions in one part of Europe than in another. Within that system, the only way to mitigate the inequalities and problems that will arise will be through massive transfers of funds across Europe.

Mr. Butterfill: I am very surprised to hear that argument from a Conservative Member. We have seen what has happened under our own regional policy. In the United Kingdom, where, my hon. Friend may be surprised to know, we have a monetary union, we have tried to deal with the problems of having some poor and some rich regions by pouring money into the poorer ones, which is what the Labour party has advocated for years. The effect has not been to improve the lot of the poorer regions. In fact, the lot of the poorer regions has improved only when they have had the wit to abandon some of the restrictive practices imposed by trade unions, to embrace free markets and to encourage inward investment. It is the encouragement of inward investment into the poorer parts of the Community which will ultimately be their salvation. Therefore, we have nothing to fear from a system that brings a single interest rate, combined with a single currency, throughout the European Community. However, we shall take a considerable time to get there.

Dr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): The previous contribution was extremely interesting. If the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) had given way, I would have asked him to consider the scale of transfers within this country and this monetary union. Many of us consider them to be inadequate, but they take place automatically between regions when unemployment is higher in one part of the country than in another. The scale of those transfers is inadequate, but it far exceeds anything planned under the Maastricht treaty as part of the movement to a single currency and to monetary union. I shall say more about that a little later.

The vast majority of amendments in this group, including the modest amendment No. 101 tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) and me, are clearly critical of economic and monetary union, as is amendment No. 36, which I strongly support. One of the interesting features of the Maastricht treaty has been pointed out by the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell). The essence of the treaty is economic and monetary union. About a quarter of the treaty's pages relate to banking arrangements and monetary policies. It is interesting to note that the treaty contains very little reference to other aspects of economic policy but that a quarter of the treaty—its guts and its specific proposals—relate to banking arrangements and monetary policy.

There is little doubt that hon. Members such as myself, who have not yet spoken in the debate, must state whether we are Euro-sceptics or anti-European. For the record, I am not a Euro-sceptic or anti-European. I am strongly pro-European. I am so pro-European that I do not want to support a treaty which will impose monetarism, deflation and unemployment on other members of the European Community, as it would here. There is little doubt that the treaty is a victory for those who believe that economic policy is essentially monetary policy and that the achievement of price stability—zero inflation—is the only worthwhile objective of macro-economic policy.

The view is staggeringly irrelevant, given the enormity of the recession and the unemployment facing the European Community. However, monetary policy as the instrument, and price stability or zero inflation as the objective, seem to be the sum total of economic policy in the treaty. It is a view promoted by bankers, among others, who tell us that it is best to take monetary policy out of democratic control and to put it in their good care.

As for democratic control, I cannot help but remember the enthusiasm that many had for democratising the composition of the Committee of the Regions. It is an advisory body, but it was nevertheless apparently a great victory for democracy when the Government were told in no uncertain terms that they must appoint to it representatives of local communities. That was a great victory for democracy, and I should like a similar victory for democracy when we come to deal with the European central bank or similar institutions.

As for the the "good care" of bankers, I find it surprising that anyone should be convinced by the argument that we should hand them more powers. I could be wrong, but I thought that bankers had something to do with the third world debt crisis because they pursued ill-informed and exceedingly ill-judged lending policies. I could be wrong, but I thought that they had something to do with the disastrous financial deregulation in the 1980s, which led to a wholly unsustainable credit boom and the debt problems that we now face. I am pretty certain that it is also bankers who, with some others, get into hysterics about the extent of public sector borrowing, yet enjoy every little bit of interest that they can get from the much more serious problem of private sectror debt. Private sector debt is okay, because bankers do all right out of it.

In fairness, I must add that my opposition to the European system of central bank proposals in the Maastricht treaty is based, not simply on the fact that the bankers support them, but on my genuine belief that economic and monetary union will have the biggest impact of any of the proposals in the treaty, and will inflict serious damage on the economies of Europe.

The proposals are also exceedingly outdated. I find it strange that some people present them as modern when they are based on ideas that became fashionable in certain quarters in the 1980s. It is true that the Delors report was not the first document to promote monetary union within Europe but, if I may be forgiven for not going as far back as some other hon. Members have done, I remind the Committee that in the 1980s, both before and during the debates on the Delors report, the orthodoxy was that we should go for an independent monetary policy aimed exclusively at price stability. That is an old-fashioned idea, extremely inappropriate for Europe in the 1990s, let alone beyond.

My opposition to that part of the treaty is based on the fact that the proposals are confused, monetarist, deflationary and undemocratic. I shall say a few brief words about each of those characteristics, starting with the confusion. It is true that other treaties have confused institutional arrangements for arriving at economic policy with the policy itself. Many treaties, including the treaty of Rome, could be said to have done that. But in the Maastricht treaty there is a hopeless confusion between the institutional framework for setting monetary and fiscal policy—the European system of central banks, the European Monetary Institute, the European central bank, and so forth—and a particular approach to monetary and fiscal policy—the policy to be pursued by the central bank, the convergence conditions, and so forth.

If we wish to establish a set of institutional arrangements for the conduct of economic policy in Europe, they should be robust enough to accommodate policy change. But in Maastricht, we have a mixture, a mess and a confusion between a set of institutions designed to arrive at an economic policy, and a particular economic policy. There has been an accommodation between the Euro-federalists, who have got the kind of institutions they quite fancied, and the monetarists, who have got the economic policy that they wanted.

[Dr. Roger Berry]

Such confusion is hopeless when it comes to making treaties. Institutions should be able to accommodate changes in policy—unless, of course, the purpose was that we should never change our economic policy. Perhaps the idea was that we would agree the treaty and that would be the end of policy making. In policy terms, that is alarming, because Maastricht reflects an obsession with inflation and —more importantly—an indifference to unemployment that were inappropriate even in the 1980s, and are grotesque in the 1990s.

The objective of the European system of central banks has not been referred to in the debate, although it has been referred to previously. It is essential to repeat it in order to understand the concerns behind the amendments. Article 105 clearly sets out that objective:

"The primary objective of the ESCB shall be to maintain price stability."

Price stability means zero inflation. Of course the European central banks should support the general economic policies set out in article 2—we have heard that often enough—but those policies are not seriously referred to anywhere else in the treaty, so they will not cause too much of a problem. Article 105 says that the ESCB should refer to the general policies in article 2, but that it should do so "Without prejudice to the objective of price stability".

8.15 pm

The objective is clear. We have an independent central bank which is to be established with the legal requirement that its overriding objective should be zero inflation. None of that is accidental. The intellectual roots of the programme are monetarist—the Delors report and before. The pathological obsession with budget deficits and the money supply that is evident throughout Maastricht is based on two monetarist dogmas. The first is that the proper control of the money supply will eliminate inflation, and that that can happen without any harmful effects on unemployment, growth or the real economy.

The second crucial monetarist dogma is that unemployment and growth are determined entirely by supply side conditions, so demand management can be relegated as if it had no importance, or at least only secondary importance. That is not only nonsense but dangerous nonsense. It is why price stability is the overriding objective for the European central bank, and why we are to have an independent central bank with the constitutional requirement to pursue price stability at all costs.

The monetarism is self-evident, and it should be a cause for concern not only among the Opposition. Even the Government no longer accept monetarism——

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Berry: I shall finish my point, and then give way.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is desperate to use monetary policy to engineer a consumer-led boom, desperate to use interest rates to encourage consumers to spend more so as to steer the economy out of recession. He no longer believes that zero inflation is a sensible objective, nor does his practice suggest that he still believes that monetary policy should be handed over to somebody else.

Mr. Randall: I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend has said about maintaining price stability, but I am worried about the way in which he has written off article 2 by saying that it has been mentioned only once and that it therefore loses its validity. I am sure that that is not terribly logical.

Dr. Berry: I am not conscious of having said that article 2 had been mentioned only once; it has been mentioned many times in the debate. Article 2 is made much of in connection with the European central bank in an attempt to support the proposition that such a bank would be about more than aiming at zero inflation—a rather stupid objective—because the article refers to employment, growth and so on. But although article 2 mentions employment and growth, the rest of the treaty does not. The treaty places on the European central bank and the other monetary institutions the requirement to pursue zero inflation, but there is no corresponding obligation to pursue policies that deal with the real economy. That is the relevance of what I was saying.

Mr. Shore: We have heard a lot about article 2, and it is nonsense to give it the elevated importance afforded it by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). If the other parts of that article, including the commitment to a high level of employment, were basic to the treaty, there would be a protocol on the subject, and all kinds of elaboration—measures to be taken and commitments made. There are no such commitments, and that is why the balance of what my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West said to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry) is wrong.

Dr. Berry: I agree with my right hon. Friend. If one accepts the monetarist position, one can have no objection to those provisions in the Maastricht treaty. Of course one could have no objection to aiming for price stability, because one would believe that it did not affect unemployment or growth. One could not object to setting up an independent central bank beyond anyone else's control, with the specific requirement to achieve price stability, because that would not affect the real economy, so there would be no problem.

To a hard-line monetarist, there is, of course, no difficulty with the proposals, but unfortunately for those who support the Maastricht treaty, no one believes that nonsense any longer—not even the present Government. As has already been said, in a few years' time, our debates may well be judged to have been about a set of proposals that were so unsustainable politically, so unrealistic and so devoid of any recognition of how the real economy works that they will never be implemented. Unfortunately, however, they are the proposals that we have an obligation to debate today.

The monetarist agenda is deflationary, simply because any fool can get zero inflation by hammering the real economy, pushing up unemployment, restraining growth and creating recession. It has been done many times and no doubt it will happen again if certain people have their way. Maastricht is deflationary in other respects, too.

I shall not refer—because it would be out of order, Dame Janet—to the convergence criteria in stages 2 and 3, to which we shall return later, but the whole question of a single currency and monetary union is worthy of attention. I recognise that a single currency has benefits.

Mr. Radice: Good.

Dr. Berry: I recognise that—and not for the first time, as my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) knows. Any fool who did not recognise that there were some benefits in monetary union would have difficulty in explaining why we have a single currency in this country. We have a single currency because there are benefits. Equally, though, we do not have one currency throughout the world because there are certain disbenefits. Any sensible economic argument about the optimal area for a single currency must address advantages and disadvantages.

I say to my sedentary hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North that I of course recognise the advantages of a single currency. It is true that there may be efficiency gains to be had from the elimination of the costs of exchanging currencies or from the elimination of risk due to exchange rate uncertainty. I concede that. I recognise that a third of what our economy produces is exported and that 60 per cent. of our trade is with the other members of the European Community. Although it is possible to exaggerate those efficiency gains, I recognise that they exist. I also recognise that a single currency would reduce speculation by the simple device of removing some other currencies against which people could speculate, and that there could be virtues—least for Labour Governments—in such a situation.

There are costs as well, however, and they are profound. Above all, a single currency imposes restrictions on the instruments of macro-economic policy that we can use. In the context of this debate, a single currency in Europe imposes a restriction on what we can do in terms of exchange rate and monetary policy. I invite any hon. Member who thinks that this line of argument is trivial to imagine how uncomfortable the present Government would feel if they did not have some flexibility in relation to the exchange rate and monetary policy and how some of the Opposition's proposals would sound if exchange rate and monetary policy had already been abandoned.

Mr. Radice: But the Maastricht treaty leaves exchange rate policy in the hands of the Council. It is not governed by the central bank at all.

Dr. Berry: I am trying to work out why my hon. Friend is being so antagonistic. On occasion, I say something with which he agrees——

Mr. Radice: I am trying to be helpful.

Dr. Berry: My hon. Friend has conceded the point that the treaty removes from the national Governments of member states the power to influence exchange rate policy —[Interruption.] I am afraid that it does. One cannot say, "Power is located elsewhere and yet at the same time resides here." It must be one thing or the other.

The cost of a single currency is that the nation states or regions that decide to join in a single currency area give up certain instruments of macro-economic policy: most notably, they have less flexibility on monetary policy and no flexibility in relation to exchange rate policy, for self-evident reasons.

At present, if a country or region in the European Community, as elsewhere, becomes less competitive—no prizes for guessing examples—balance of payments problems emerge and unemployment increases. With monetary union, balance of payments problems will re-emerge as even greater problems of unemployment. Quite simply, the market adjusts to changing levels of competitiveness by generating higher unemployment in less competitive regions. That must be so. That is how the market operates. We need to think very carefully before we support a single currency arrangement given that we know, as a matter of simple fact—there is no difference between the two sides of the Committee on this—that that is how the market adjusts to differences in competitiveness.

To return to my first point, it is a fact that, within nation state monetary unions such as the United States, Germany and this country——

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Berry: Yes, of course—even in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. Sheldon: The point that my hon. Friend is making is well understood. Most of what he said is absolutely right and no one ought to quarrel with it; he has put both sides of the argument. As my hon. Friend says, a union could increase unemployment. On the other hand, one could react by reducing the cost of labour. One of the principal reasons why the Government are so opposed to the social chapter is that it denies them that alternative. They must be against the social chapter because, if we are uncompetitive, such action is the only solution that they have—other than increasing levels of unemployment even further.

Dr. Berry: I agree with my right hon. Friend. That is absolutely correct.

Given that these facts are well known, I shall simply re-state my point. The difference between the proposal for a single currency within the European Community and what exists today in the United States, Germany and the United Kingdom is that, in the case of those three nation states, there are substantial fiscal systems that redistribute resources. There is automatic fiscal redistribution in the United Kingdom, as areas of high unemployment contribute less in tax and receive more in revenue. In Germany, there are formal systems for the redistribution of wealth between the lander.

The Maastricht treaty contains no equivalent way of addressing such imbalances. That is why I argue strongly that it is simply not sensible for member states of the European Community to sacrifice instruments of national macro-economic policy without much larger European Community budget and/or automatic redistributive mechanisms. Maastricht provides neither. It will therefore be profoundly deflationary in the less competitive regions.

Mr. Betts: I accept the point that my hon. Friend makes and agree that additional money within the Community budget and the mechanisms to which he has referred are not specifically mentioned in the Maastricht treaty. Does he not accept, however, that such matters are capable of development within the European Community? There is no restriction in the treaty to prevent them from being developed. Might not that be another way of looking at the situation? Might we not take the view that monetary union can be developed in the context of other measures to stop the problems of unemployment, which I recognise and on which I agree with my hon. Friend?

8.30 pm

Dr. Berry: That is a bit like saying that the Budget that we have just debated is capable of being developed to allow us to address mass unemployment in Britain. Of course it is capable of being so developed. The fact that that subject was not dealt with in the Budget was the reason why the Opposition said that it was inadequate to address unemployment and economic recovery. Anything could happen after Maastricht. But there is a treaty before us which contains words and which we must read and understand. Running through the many pages of the treaty dealing with economic matters is the single-minded obsession with the monetarist objective of zero inflation and the monetarist instrument of an independent central bank controlling monetary policy. There is nothing of the kind to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Mandelson: On the subject of obsession, my hon. Friend appears to be overly obsessed by the words and gives insufficient attention to the actions that can be taken by politicians and Governments within the framework of the Maastricht treaty—[Interruption.] It is not good enough for those who disagree with other hon. Members to bawl and shout and attempt to prevent them from speaking. That is an unattractive characteristic of this debate. It shows an obvious weakness of argument among some of my hon. Friends.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry) referred to the Budget. Is he aware that it is up to politicians and Ministers to take decisions, to form judgments and to implement policies? What is in the Maastricht treaty that prevents politicians and Ministers from taking such desirable decisions within the economic policy guidelines which are a feature of the treaty and which it is up to politicians to draw up and implement?

Dr. Berry: As my hon. Friend wants chapter and verse, I quote article 107:

"When exercising the powers and carrying out the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty and the Statute of the ESCB, neither the ECB, nor a national central bank, nor any member of their decision-making bodies shall seek or take instructions from Community institutions or bodies, from any government of a Member State or from any other body. The Community institutions and bodies and the governments of the Member States undertake to respect this principle and not to seek to influence the members of the decision-making bodies of the ECB or of the national central banks in the performance of their tasks."

Mr. Mandelson: Well——

Dr. Berry: My hon. Friend will agree that I have not barracked anybody so far. I am attempting to answer his question. If he thinks that that article, explaining how politicians cannot influence the central bank, is inadequate, perhaps he will allow me to summarise my understanding of the provision, and then he can explain why the words mean something different to him. I am not a lawyer; I am a humble hack——

Mr. Legg: And an economist.

Dr. Berry: Yes, I plead guilty to being one of those.

On the basis of my knowledge of the English language, article 107 instructs the European central bank and the Bank of England—denationalised by then, under the treaty—not to take instructions from anyone. It also commits the signatories to the treaty not to seek to influence the European central bank or national central banks.

Mr. Radice: My hon. Friend argues that economic and monetary union is against the interests of the weakest regions. There is in the Maastricht treaty—whether it is adequate is debatable; I do not think it is sufficiently adequate—a mechanism for dealing with that problem. It is called the structural fund and the cohesion fund. If my hon. Friend had mentioned those funds, he might have had a fair point. He is implying that there is no mechanism in the treaty to deal with such problems. There is a mechanism, though it needs to be expanded.

Dr. Berry: Redistribution takes place in the European Community. I thought I had pointed out that its extent was inadequate to justify the unleashing of a single currency on member states. In essence, I do not believe that the degree of economic, social and political cohesion necessary for the benefits of a single currency to outweigh the costs exists in the European Community now. I happily recognise that there are benefits from a single currency, but it is foolish in the extreme simply to assume that the costs in terms of rising unemployment that a single currency would impose now could be addressed through the terms of the Maastricht treaty.

There is also a nonsense in the Maastricht treaty as it tries to separate monetary policy from the rest of economic policy. How is fiscal policy—public expenditure and taxation policy—to be run in such circumstances? It cannot be left to a few simple rules about budget deficits. Limiting the size of public sector deficits does not determine a fiscal framework, because the macro-economic effects of a budget depend on much more than the size of the deficit. One could have the same deficit for radically different levels of expenditure and taxation. It is rumoured that there are some heretics in this place who might believe that we should have higher levels of expenditure and possibly even higher levels of taxation.

A fiscal policy cannot be determined purely by the size of a budget deficit. Fiscal and monetary policy must be determined together. If one produces a budget, one must discuss how it is to be paid for. It would be ridiculous to have one body—in this case an independent European central bank—setting monetary policy, whatever the objectives, with fiscal policy for Europe being determined somewhere else.

There is logic in the argument that, if there is to be monetary union in the European Community and a single currency, we must have political union as well so that there can be democratic control of economic policy. Maastricht does not set out to do that. It hands over monetary policy to the control of non-elected and unaccountable bankers with the legal requirement that they deflate the European economy, but it says little about how that fits in with other aspects of economic policy in Europe. I cannot see how any democrat could support that.

It seems self-evident that the political, economic and social cohesion necessary for a single currency in the EC does not exist today. Any democrat who was arguing for monetary union now would have to argue for political union as well. That would be the only way to achieve democratic control.

In other words, the options are simple. Either we maintain our separate currencies—and co-ordinate

European policy, so long as that is in favour of reflation and not deflation; we assume that we co-ordinate in the desirable direction, though there is some evidence that we do not always do that—and co-ordinate our economic policies to aim for full employment and economic recovery, or we go for a single currency and European political union. I do not believe that the second is either on offer or is desirable at this stage, so I strongly support the first of the two options.

The middle way that says, "We shall not go for democratic institutions in Europe that will control economic policy at a different level from the present nation state but will, on the other hand, hand over the control of monetary policy to non-elected bankers" is confused, monetarist and undemocratic, and will lead to rising unemployment in Europe and, in so doing—paradoxically, perhaps, in the view of some of those advocating it—will lead to greater division in Europe.

I do not want Europe to be rent asunder by an economic package which will increase unemployment and thereby divide. I want a Europe which addresses full employment. The Maastricht treaty does not do it. I hope that at least one of the amendments in this group—whether it is amendment No. 36, amendment No. 101 or whatever—which effectively undermine the proposals for a single currency, is carried, because otherwise it will be a disaster for not simply the United Kingdom but the other economies in Europe.

Mr. Gill: I shall try to focus the Committee's attention on the effects of creating a European central bank on the people of the United Kingdom, the politicians who represent them and, indeed, the political parties to which we all belong. I apologise for quoting article 107 again, but I shall paraphrase:

"neither the ECB, nor a national central bank . . . shall seek or take instructions . . . from any government of a Member State".

In other words, we will remove from the House and, therefore, the control of the people of the United Kingdom that essential element which gives them control over their destiny—money. Money is power. Through the ages, people and politicians have recognised that control of money is the control of power. If we cede the control of money to a European central bank by this Bill, we shall have effectively ceded the control which the people in the United Kingdom previously vested in their elected representatives in the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What does the hon. Gentleman think of the idea that one cannot control what one does not own?

Mr. Gill: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right; I entirely agree. I should like to ask the Financial Secretary how the Government, who do not believe in returning the Bank of England to the private sector, are prepared, by dint of this treaty, to cede control of the whole of the British economy to an unelected and uncontrollable European central bank without first experimenting in the United Kingdom to see whether it can possibly work. It seems to be entirely illogical that we should proceed along those lines without at least experimenting in our own country, especially when we have a Government who are committed to returning most state institutions back to the private sector.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will respond to my question because many of my constituents find it difficult to understand why, when we are privatising commercial undertakings—at present we face the prospect of privatising the railways—we do not consider that it is important to privatise the Bank of England. At the same time, we are saying that they must support a treaty which will remove instruments that I would prefer to vest in the control of the Bank of England to a European central bank where nationals of other countries will control what our monetary policy will be. It follows that those nationals will also be controlling our fiscal policy.

I shall come back to my theme, which is the effect that the transfer of control and power to a European central bank will have on us and the people whom we represent. If we reach the point—which we inevitably will—at which we are not free agents in this House to make those decisions which the electorate expect us to make, it will be a poor day for British politics and British politicians. The effects of removing such powers from the United Kingdom and vesting them abroad is that, at a stroke, one divides the two principles of good management—authority and responsibilty. In any properly managed organisation, those two principles must be vested in the same pair of hands.

8.45 pm

The people of the United Kingdom look to us to be responsible for all that goes on in this country and all that which affects their lives. If we decide that we will put the authority for much of what we must decide beyond our shores to be decided for us, we will create the classic symptoms of bad management. We will have put authority in one pair of hands and vested responsibility in another pair of hands. Anyone who has any experience of management knows that that simply does not work.

Many right hon. and hon. Members appreciate the unsatisfactory nature of having to tell constituents, "I understand your complaint. I sympathise and agree with your complaint, but it is out of my hands. I cannot do anything about it." I submit that the electorate will not put up with that. People will soon become disenchanted, first, shall we say, with the Conservative Government. They might even be tempted to vote for the Opposition party. It will not be long before the Labour party is proved to be in exactly the same powerless situation as that which I have described. In due course, people will conclude that there is no point in voting for any politician or any party. That is a dangerous position in which to put our country. It will mean that people will feel that there is no point in voting for any party and will, therefore, vote for no party.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does it follow that, if such power is handed to a central bank and if people who are elected to government are able to shrug off any responsibility by saying that it is not their fault or responsibility because the decisions are made by the central bank, and the procedure was approved by Parliament through a treaty, a degree of alienation will develop which will result in people taking action, possibly by violent means, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said, to seek alternative solutions to the real problems of, for example, widespread unemployment which might result from the decisions of a central bank?

Mr. Gill: That is exactly my fear. In extreme circumstances, we will reach the position described by the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, portrayed by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn).

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield used an interesting word. He talked about the "confidence" of the nation. I do not have much confidence standing up in the Chamber and delivering a speech, but I have every confidence that my views are absolutely sound. I have not a scintilla of doubt that when I oppose the treaty, and especially when I oppose those new clauses before us tonight, I am doing the right thing because I am in tune with the people whom I represent and the majority of people in the United Kingdom.

Whether or not the majority of the people of Britain are right or wrong on the issue is not the point. If the majority of the people believe that we should not sign the treaty —I believe that that is their view—we should not sign it. If one believes in democracy, one believes that the view of the majority should prevail.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) said that many politicians and Ministers would find themselves powerless to answer responsibly to the electorate. He may recognise that some right hon. and hon. Members might be content with that position. I do not suggest that the hon. Gentleman would be content with it. I have a different opinion. I believe that he would stand up robustly for the views that he holds—with which, incidentally, I disagree, except on this issue. He would not be afraid to stand up for his views and defend them to the people he represents.

However, sad to say, other hon. Members might be content to shelter behind the European central bank or the Common Market and say to the people, "We have done our best. We would like to do more, but sadly the matter is out of our hands." I agree with the hon. Member for Bradford, South that that would lead to great alienation in our nation. We should not underestimate for one minute the threat to our democracy from proceeding with the establishment of a European central bank.

Of course, the establishment of a European central bank would inevitably lead to a central currency. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) suggested that there would be 12 Chancellors of the Exchequer if we had a single currency. I agreed with much of what he said in his excellent speech, but I disagreed with him on this one detail.

If we had a European central bank and a single currency, there would be but one Chancellor of the Exchequer in Europe and the prospect is that that Chancellor would not reside at No. 11 Downing street. He might not be a Member of this Parliament. There is a great possibility that he would be German. That theme was developed by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey. He forecast that the creation of a central bank and single currency would mean that the deutschmark became the currency of the European Community.

Mr. Cryer: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some people have the mistaken notion that the Maastricht treaty brings nations together and that we should work towards some conglomerate, as if that was an idealistic aim? Does he agree that where nations are compelled to join together, tensions and antagonisms are created, as we have seen in eastern Europe, following the break-up of the Soviet bloc? An enormous degree of nationalism has developed and vicious tensions have arisen which have led to enormous tragedies. The idea of forcing nations together instead of nations working together as equals is festooned with doom and potential disaster.

Mr. Gill: I am more than willing to respond to that intervention, but if I do so directly, I risk being ruled out of order by you, Dame Janet. I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's question in the context of the European central bank. He and I talk the same language. I suggest that if 12 Finance Ministers sat round a table trying to decide matters which affected the economic and monetary policy of the European Community, the decision that would emerge from their deliberations would not satisfy him or, indeed, me. Nor would it satisfy the citizens of the 11 other nations which were party to the deliberations.

It is a simple fact that any decision reached by 12 Ministers on future policy would be a compromise. No other country would accept what Britain would like to see imposed any more than Britain would accept what another country would like to see imposed. Already we have so many examples of decisions affecting Britain which have been taken by that process of compromise. Decisions invariably arrive after the event. They are almost invariably late. We do not get decisions when we want them. When they arrive, they are compromises. That is the nature of the beast. They fit where they touch.

The establishment of a central bank would affect the people we represent. Indeed, people will increasingly resent having to accept a compromise decision which they feel in their bones was not the decision that their Members of Parliament in their sovereign Parliament would have reached if they had been in a position to do so. If people feel that they cannot get a satisfactory answer from their elected Members in debates in their own Parliament, they will become disillusioned and disenchanted with the whole body politic. That is very dangerous to our democracy —I stress the words "our democracy".

Our democracy is much older than any of the democracies of the 11 nations which compromise the European Community. Our democracy has evolved. It may not be the perfect democracy, but it suits the British people. The system of democracy that we have built up in this Parliament has been founded on the unions created in the British Isles many centuries ago. It just happens that our system of government suits us in the main. People criticise it—it is not perfect and I do not pretend it is but the system has evolved over many centuries and it suits us now.

Of course, we try to compromise. We keep coming back to that word. Now we are trying to compromise our system of government, which I stress has suited us for many centuries, within another system which also has to accommodate the systems of government that have built up in 11 other nations.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman was extolling the virtues of British parliamentary democracy. Would he care to comment on the following point? As far as I understand it, we are the only Parliament of the Twelve that does not have the power to ratify treaties.

Mr. Gill: That is an interesting point, but the hon. Gentleman knows what we are debating and why the House gives such great importance to the Bill. He knows that we have taken so many days to debate it simply because of the importance that we and—I shall not miss the opportunity to say—the people we represent attach to this particular subject.

I was speaking about the union of the United Kingdom. For hundreds of years, we have had a union, or one could say a common market, within the British Isles. We certainly have a single currency. The conclusions that I draw from our history are perhaps different from those expressed by other hon. Members. It is an object lesson for Britain to learn as it shapes up perhaps to partaking in a broader Europe involving a European central bank and a single currency. A single currency has not removed all the frictions, difficulties and tensions in our society.

What inevitably happened and will continue to happen is that richer regions of the United Kingdom have to divvy up each and every year to make funds available to the poorer regions so that those poorer regions can be sustained within the overall union of the United Kingdom.

Those who believe that our involvement in the European Community will benefit our own regions delude themselves. Britain is already paying some £2 billion net each year to the Community. That money does not return to these shores. Opposition Members might support my view that that money could usefully go to the regions of the United Kingdom, but is more likely in future, through the cohesion fund, to go to Greece, Portugal, Spain and Southern Ireland. That will be the effect of the greater union that we are now creating. Instead of the wealth of the nation being used to support our regional policy, it will be used increasingly to support other economies.

As an example of how the creation of another single currency has worked to the disadvantage of Britain, I instance what has happened in agriculture. Many right hon. and hon. Gentlemen will appreciate that through the common agricultural policy we have effectively created a common currency—the green currency. To some extent, we have created the equivalent of a European monetary system because, through the compensatory allowances, the green currencies can be adjusted so that no country is disadvantaged. The result has not been enormous prosperity in farming or great happiness to farmers, but quite the reverse. The taxpayer, both directly though his taxes and indirectly as a purchaser of agricultural produce, has had to pay a very high price.

I am mindful of a statistic which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has quoted before. If Britain simply gave every farmer each year the index-linked equivalent of £127,000, that would represent a saving to the Exchequer compared with what is happening now. Although we spend more than £127,000 per farmer each year, our agriculture is in a parlous state and very few farmers are content with their earnings and the profitability of their businesses.

Here again one sees a single currency effectively at work, but it has not delivered prosperity or easier working in that industry; it has delivered the absolute opposite.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lindsey, East spoke about the possible aspirations of the German people for the deutschmark to become the currency of Europe after the creation of the European central bank and of a single currency. If the Germans were able to achieve their aspirations, it would preclude English people from achieving any of theirs.

That is a feature which many young people in this country recognise today. They are looking askance at this treaty, which we may be in danger of signing, because they see that signing it will remove from them much of the responsibility for their lives and the authority to do something about their lives and their country. They can see responsibility for the future of their country passing from these shores and being vested in the hands of the nationals of other countries. Many young people today, therefore, are totally opposed to the treaty, to the creation of the single market and to the creation of a European central bank because they see the total erosion of any prospect of their controlling the destiny of their country.

Every one of us, within our limitations, aspires to be able to do something for our country. I feel passionately strongly about this country and about the ability of its people to manage their own affairs, control their own destiny and deliver the standard of living and way of life that they want. Young people, in particular, recognise that all the time we cede power from Parliament we are disposing of their future ability to serve their country and their people and to provide for their families in the way that they would like.

In the end, what is important and what we must take seriously in doing whatever we do in the House is to create the circumstances in which the people of this country can see their aspirations achieved. If we cannot do so, we should not be signing the treaty. If we deny the people the achievement of their legitimate aspirations, we risk unleashing forces which it will be difficult to control. Many argue that the treaty is necessary to suppress the forces of nationalism. I take the contrary view. If, by whatever means—the creation of a single currency or the creation of a European central bank—we deny people the opportunity to achieve their natural and legitimate aspirations, we shall encourage in the British Isles more nationalism than is perhaps already there.

The richer regions of this country are continually funding the poorer regions, but that does not buy happiness or peace because never a year goes by without the Scots, Welsh and Irish coming back to the House—and they do not come to say, "Thank you, we're grateful," but to say that it was not enough.

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): Does my hon. Friend accept that ratification of the treaty would lead to increased nationalistic tendencies and to a sense of the denial of democracy—to a feeling of frustration—which might result in disorder on the streets?

Mr. Gill: I have answered that argument in one way, but I should like the opportunity to do so in another, Dame Janet.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will do so in a way that relates to the amendments under consideration.

Mr. Gill: I shall do my level best to ensure that I meet those requirements, Dame Janet.

The coinage of the realm is at stake. If it is controlled by the European central bank, and if all the decisions affecting it are seen by the people of this country to be defective, or if they disagree fundamentally or in detail with the decisions of the central bankers, it will be a bad day for this country and for its people and there will be enormous resentment.

[Mr. Gill]

If people feel that they cannot get redress through the ballot box, they will be left with no alternative but to seek other measures. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) shares my view that that would also be a sad day for this country.

During our debates in Committee, much play has been made of the word "loyalty" and loyalty to party and constituents have been mentioned, but I suggest that there are two other important loyalties—loyalty to oneself and to one's country. I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): This will be my first intervention in the Maastricht debate. As the Committee has progressed, I have noticed that the shorter an hon. Member's notes, the longer his speech. I have some notes here, but they are approximately in proportion to the length of the speech that I intend to make.

I have been interested in some of the exchanges of views. One would have thought that the thrust of the argument of those who oppose the amendment is that it is a terrible thing to have an independent bank, and that one needs a bank that is under clear control. Then one would have control of the economy, and problems such as unemployment would be eliminated. That would be a bank similar to the Bank of England, but we have the Bank of England and it is under control, and we also have 3 million unemployed and an appalling balance of payments deficit. That seems to have escaped some of the critics of the developments that the treaty seeks to recommend for this country and for the Community.

I was interested to hear the speech by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), and found it strange to see myself as a rising new Liberal Democrat, hearing the voice of a decaying old socialist, who was quoting Liberal history at me. He seemed to be accusing people of pessimism, but he seemed to be afraid of embracing change and of finding instruments in the mechanism whereby it can be brought about.

The treaty is about trying to take a step forward to build mechanisms, which will have to evolve as the Community has evolved since its inception. It is no secret to the Committee that my party has long argued the case for an independent central bank for the United Kingdom, and not only for the European Community as it develops. I should like to say why we think that an independent central bank is desirable—I stress "independent" rather than "unaccountable".

Mr. Mandelson: The reasons for the hon. Gentleman's party's support for an independent central bank will be of great interest to the Committee. Before giving those reasons, however, will he say whether the independent central bank that he advocates should have absolutely no political relationship with Parliament? Why have his hon. Friends said outside this Chamber that they are not prepared to support amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) to achieve some answerability and accountability? Surely that is completely inconsistent with, and contradictory of, everything that Liberal Democrats stand for.

9.15 pm

Mr. Bruce: As I said before I was interrupted, there is a difference between independence and lack of accountability. As has been clearly pointed out, an independent bank is appointed by politicians and operates within a constitutional framework determined by politicians and capable of being amended by politicians.

But I want to answer the hon. Gentleman's question directly. What is not acceptable is the suggestion that the bank should be accountable, in its day-to-day management of the economy, to the Government or to the House of Commons. This point has been addressed by Conservative Members. The problem arising out of the amendment is not whether the bank should report to the House of Commons. Such reporting would present us with no serious problem, but difficulty would arise if reports were put to a vote. The consequences would clearly compromise the principle of the bank's freedom of action and independence. That is why we have reservations about the amendment.

The second point relates to the bank's independence to pursue the strategy set down in its constitution. In general, it has been agreed—although there have been dissenting voices in the debate today—that bearing down on inflation should be the specific responsibility of the bank, and that it should pursue policies designed to achieve that objective. Those who say that that is not the objective that a central bank should freely pursue hold a perfectly legitimate view, but the argument then hinges on changing the articles of the bank and the political framework and constitution within which it operates—if necessary, by changing the treaty. The European Community has developed, step by step, through treaties, and will continue to do so. That is and will continue to be an evolutionary process.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, even if the House of Commons, under new clause 1, were to pass a resolution to the effect that the activities of our central bank were a mixture of lunacy, irresponsibility and madness, the decisions of the bank, in terms of the treaty, would not be affected in any way? Would not the bank be acting illegally if it paid the slightest attention to the views of the House of Commons?

Mr. Bruce: What the hon. Gentleman says is true, although I suspect that it might be quite difficult to prove. The argument has already been advanced in the case of the Bundesbank, which is independent and is required, within specific parameters, to operate independently and not to be directed by the German Government. However, there is a sanction. First, appointment is by the Government, and I suppose that in extreme circumstances the Government could dismiss. But the Government cannot tell the bank to change its policies within specific, legally defined areas.

Policies outside those areas are a different matter. This is about setting up mechanisms by which the bank will operate and mechanisms for effecting change from time to time should the need arise. But there should not be interference in day-to-day management. That is the meaning of independence.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is displaying incredible ignorance of the nature and functions of the Bundesbank. One thing that is crystal clear is that the German Federal Government are responsible for economic objectives, whereas the Bundesbank merely has a function with respect to questions of currency stability. Everything that the hon. Gentleman says displays a complete lack of knowledge of how the system functions. I do not understand how his party, whose name includes the words "Liberal Democratic", and which has the tradition of the Liberal party behind it, can endorse a system so thoroughly undemocratic and authoritarian. It is an unbelievable position. The people of this country need to know what a fraud the Liberal Democrats are perpetrating on their own electors.

Mr. Bruce: I shall take that intervention for what it is worth, but I think that the hon. Gentleman might listen to the argument before launching his attack. I shall not make the mistake of giving way to him again.

The first argument that we have made is that the pragmatic evidence is that independent central banks have an extremely good record of bearing down on inflation. There is plenty of evidence, not just theoretical but practical, to show that, when a bank acts independently, the record on reducing inflation is extremely good.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) comments about the Bundesbank——

Mr. Denzil Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: I shall not give way, as I wish to develop my argument. It becomes difficult to do so if one is interrupted every sentence.

The evidence shows that independent banks are effective in reducing inflation. A study published in 1991 by Vittorio Grilli expressed that graphically. It said:

"Central bank independence is tantamount to free lunch: it delivers low inflation with no apparent costs to the real economy's macroeconomic performance."

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: I should like to proceed further with my argument, as I have a number of issues to raise.

I accept that my argument can be seen at present in practical terms only in individual nation states, as that is all we have to base it on. It has been argued that the effectiveness of a bank in bearing down on inflation and resisting political pressures across the whole of Europe would be less apparent. However, it can be argued that, in a single state, a general election can result in political pressures that affect the framework and organisation of the bank. It is unlikely that all 12 member states will face re-election at the same time, which would ensure greater independence than there is in a single member state.

It is also interesting that those who seem to oppose the concept of a bank operating within specific parameters for particular purposes without day-to-day political interference also seem to believe that, where that interference is apparent and overt, as it has been in this country, it automatically works in the national interest and meets the needs of constituents and electors. I have listened with interest, not only in this debate, but in previous debates, to criticisms—particularly from within the Conservative party—about our membership of the exchange rate mechanism, its undesirability and its effect on interest rates.

I remind Conservative Members of the circumstances in which we joined the ERM. There were numerous opportunities over many years for the Government to decide when the mix of exchange rate mechanisms was right. They missed every one of those opportunities—almost any of which would have been a better moment to enter than that when the Government decided to do so. It was not the Bank of England that decided when to enter, but the Government. They did so on the eve of the Conservative party conference in order to secure a standing ovation the following day.

That was the most short-term policy manipulation, as a result of which we entered the ERM at the wrong rate. The policy was successful in reducing inflation over a period, but at a severe cost. We had to sustain higher exchange rates than we would otherwise have done, because we also had to sustain interest rates.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman said that we entered the ERM at the wrong rate, which is certainly true. But in that case, why was the Liberal party so insistent on pressing us to go into narrower bands at that wrong rate?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the point of entering the exchange rate mechanism was to impose a discipline on this country, which would have enabled us to bring down inflation. We are dealing with the short term because it is only six months since we left the ERM.

Mr. Skinner: Would the hon. Gentleman go back into the ERM?

Mr. Bruce: In the present circumstances, we cannot return to it. The Bank of England has expressed the view that we should have a short transition to a single currency rather than go through a long process which leaves each currency vulnerable and open to pressure—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has moved from his usual place and is hurling sedentary abuse—[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It is quite out of order for an hon. Member to come between the Chair and the Member who is speaking in the way that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has done. Such behaviour is unacceptable.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Madam Chairman. The hon. Gentleman invited me to come back to my seat, and said that I was in an unusual position. I was about to ask him if he was prepared to go back into the ERM along with Paddy Backdown and his mates, because that would be like a dog returning to his vomit.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have heard enough.

Mr. Bruce: It is probably just as well that the hon. Gentleman's remarks are on the record. They do not do him much credit. The hon. Gentleman and those who hold his view do not have a vision of the future other than a centralised, socialist-managed state which does not yet command wide support in this country. We are trying to build a mechanism in Europe that will make the single market work and develop the Community so that its past successes can be built upon. That is the purpose of the proposals.

We need to look seriously at how we can operate a monetary system with the responsible financial management that an independent bank can provide. A system that is subject to constant political interference is almost bound to fail.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: No, I should like to make progress.

I am not convinced by the argument that a central bank is anti-democratic. If we agree that economic policy has to be underpinned by low inflation, we must agree a mechanism by which that can be done and grant to a body the authority to pursue the policies to achieve it. Most democracies do that naturally in a variety of ways every week, and it is a perfectly reasonable way to proceed.

It is not reasonable to set up bodies, in the financial sphere or anywhere else, and presume to second-guess them. I have lost count of the number of times that I have been told by Ministers at the Dispatch Box that it is inappropriate to ask them to interfere in the day-to-day management even of public bodies for which they are responsible, because it is not their job to second-guess the people they appointed to manage those institutions. That is a comparable analogy. The constitution, the organisations and the personnel can be changed, but there is no point in setting up bodies and taking decisions away from them.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The hon. Gentleman is building his case on the idea proposed by Labour Front-Bench Members that a fixed exchange rate must be established and that interest rate policies should follow from that.

The hon. Gentleman says that he likes fixed exchange rates but did not like the one that applied when Britain entered the ERM. Will he give us a clue as to the exact level of the exchange rate that he would have thought appropriate? Was it when we were shadowing the deutschmark downwards and would have had a 4 per cent. interest rate? That would not have lasted long. It would have blown apart as easily as the one that exploded on white Wednesday. What are the Labour and Liberal Front-Bench spokesmen saying? Even the Government, temporarily at least, have said that they are not subordinating all their policies to a fixed exchange rate, but the Labour party and the Liberal party seem to be pursuing that idea.

Mr. Bruce: We could dwell on the reasons that the exchange rate mechanism came under pressure, but I do not intend to do so. We could debate whether or not the Chancellor was offered realignment within the mechanism, which could have enabled it to continue on a different basis, leading to a reassessment of the German mark. The ERM failed because of a number of factors, and its failure does not mean that the reasons for being in it were unsound. More fundamentally, its failure does not alter the case for a single currency. Rather, it strengthens the case, because a single currency would be less open to speculation than 12 currencies trying to maintain agreed parities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: How do we get there?

9.30 pm

Mr. Bruce: I intend to develop my argument in my own way. I have given way several times, but I have a number of points still to make.

I made the point that the central bank would operate under a constitution written by politicians. It would be independent but also accountable.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Rubbish.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman can say, "Rubbish," if he likes, but that is how the bank would operate.

The bank's board members would be appointed by the Governments of the member states and would be representative of them. It would report annually to the European Parliament, European Council and European Commission, and its policies may be debated in the Parliament. That is a much more orderly and genuinely democratic way of going about things than having banks that are subject to short-term political pressures from politicians in a hole trying to manipulate them.

People have every reason and right to say that they do not like or want a central bank—there are perfectly reputable arguments against one—but the argument that a central bank is undemocratic does not stand up. That is by definition to say that countries such as the United States, Germany and New Zealand that have a central bank are not democratic, whereas most of them are rather more successful democracies than our own. They have operated their economies with much more success over a longer period—certainly in the case of Germany—than we have done. We can at least acknowledge that they may have something from which we can learn, rather than abuse the notion of a central bank in a non-intelligent way.

Another argument frequently used concerns the sovereignty of the House of Commons. That is a matter of opinion. Some of us believe that the sovereignty of the House is used not to liberate the citizens of this country but occasionally to enslave them. Members of Parliament can take whatever power they choose by a simple majority in the House, and the citizens of this country have no guarantee against abuse of power. Achieving a majority in the House might be easier—as the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) believes—than achieving a majority in the country. Why else does the hon. Gentleman campaign for a referendum?

Mr. Benn: It is the interrelationship between proportional representation and a central bank. One could give people any electoral system—such as one under which national lists and the votes of the seats correspond—but ultimately, the electorate could not control economic policy no matter how they voted. That would not be democratic. That is where the proportional representation argument is totally phoney. One might offer the electorate the system that the hon. Gentleman's party thinks is better, but in the end they would not control power because, as the hon. Gentleman agrees, it would be handed to somebody else.

Mr. Bruce: I do not want to be drawn too far down that road. The right hon. Gentleman raised the issue of the voting system, not me. I was talking about matters on which he and I agree—such as a Bill of Rights and the rights of citizens being written in as guarantee against the abuse of Parliament, however that Parliament may be elected. I do not regard proportional representation as the definitive answer to all questions of freedom and democracy. There must be other guarantees that do not exist in this country. So far, freedom and democracy have not been seriously and totally abused, although they have been frequently undermined.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: I should like to get on.

We must consider a question to which the amendments at least relate: how are the Government to proceed from their present stance? They are currently reserving their position on European monetary union, which is a three-stage process. We need to establish how they can go on to the third stage if they do not plan to go through the second. I hope that the Financial Secretary will explain how the Government's opt-out will, or will not, work. Alternatively, if they decide to opt in without having gone through the second stage, how can they proceed from the first stage to the third without transition?

I understand that, under the terms of the treaty, stage 2 requires us to make preparations to bring our own domestic central bank into line with the provisions of the independent bank that would be required by stage 3. If the Government resist the mechanism, how are we to achieve that in one go? There is a danger that we shall suddenly have to run extremely fast to catch up if we finally decide to go for monetary union. That is why I believe it makes sense for Britain to consider creating a more independent central bank, on its own merits and on our own terms, whether or not we opt for monetary union. First—as I have argued—that would be a better way in which to run the British economy; secondly, it would achieve the transition from an independent British bank to European monetary union with much less disruption than would otherwise occur.

I am particularly disturbed that the Government, under pressure, have gone for the opt-out, because I believe that that has had serious consequences for the development of the British economy and Britain's role as a financial centre. When I was a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, we considered the implications of the single market for financial services. We were told—not only by bankers in Paris, Madrid and Milan, but even by bankers in Frankfurt—that, in their view, if we moved towards monetary union, Britain's case for securing the headquarters of the European bank would be overwhelming, given the importance of the City of London and the political argument that Britain was entitled to take a major prize from the process.

By deciding to sign the treaty, but not necessarily to sign up for full economic and monetary union, we gave away all our bargaining position. The Germans now assume that the prize will go elsewhere, and believe that they have a very good chance of winning it. For the very reasons cited by Conservative Members, I think that it would be undesirable for the bank to be located in Germany. It is important symbolically to make it clear that, if we proceed to European monetary union, there will be a European bank and a European currency, rather than a Bundesbank and a deutschmark. Britain could have secured a pivotal role, but the Government have effectively thrown that role away.

Those are not just my words; they were uttered to me 10 days ago by Sir Leon Brittan. "How," he asked, "can I possibly suggest that Britain should have the headquarters of a club that it has not yet decided to join?"

Sir Peter Tapsell: The German Parliament has reserved its position on the single currency and will have to have another vote, which we are not necessarily promised, but how does that strengthen the German claim to have the central bank? The issue is entirely open, and the constitutional position of the two countries is the same.

Mr. Bruce: If the Germans decided not to be part of the single currency, the enterprise would collapse in any case. However, they signed up for the principle without demur at the beginning. Some Conservative Members claim to favour the development of the Community but oppose the Maastricht treaty. That is like saying that they will play golf on the same course as everyone else but that they are to get a free lift out of all the bunkers. Surprisingly, other people are not willing to play under those rules.

In the long term, it is not realistic to believe that Britain can maintain credibility within the European Community and opt-out of major developments. The danger is that the majority of the members of the Government do not intend to opt out. They intend to move towards a central bank and European monetary union, but have gone for the opt-out clause because they thought that they needed it to get the proposals accepted by the Conservative party. The contributions made in debates by Conservative Members show that they have received very little gratitude for that, so the Government have paid a high price in terms of the national interest, for no political pay-off within the party. That is something for which they will be held accountable.

The argument that there is to be one unified, centralised bank does not accord with the practicalities of how the Community will develop. That is borne out by the wording of article 107, which refers to the European central bank or the central banks of member states. It is inevitable that the central bank will work through the central banks of the member states and that it will be—to use a word which causes hackles to rise among Conservative Members—a quasi-federal arrangement rather than a wholly unitary, central operation. That in itself gives scope for a more democratic approach.

It is our contention that an independent central bank will be much more effective in pursuing policies which will bring down inflation. That is not only theoretically true but practically proven in countries which have such an institution. It is desirable for the United Kingdom to move in that direction as quickly as possible. It is wholly compatible with our democratic institutions and with broad accountability, and merely removes the day-to-day interference from the operations of the bank.

I agree that convergence will take longer than some have argued. Once it is achieved, the single market which is so enthusiastically embraced by Conservative Members will ultimately not be sustainable without a single currency and bank. We must take it step by step and must be prepared to renegotiate. That is how all democratic institutions develop. However, the process must be formalised step by step, and that is especially true when dealing with the present national frontiers. That is the evolution of constitutional advance.

It is perhaps a problem for this country that we do not have a written constitution. As we do not have such a constitution, we do not understand that, for most people, agreements must be written down and reviewed and amended from time to time. Constitutional review is a normal process in most democratic countries. If we understood that better, we might be less concerned about and afraid of what is being proposed.

The European Community is a great association of democratic states trying to build a strong economic base on which they can create their own prosperity and compete effectively with other major blocs such as the United States, Japan, the Pacific rim and, perhaps in the long run, the eastern countries with which we can also develop trading partnerships.

[Mr. Bruce]

I do not accept that the EC is a closed community; it is an open, free-trade community. But the stronger we are internally, the better we shall be able to trade externally. The mechanisms in the treaty are an essential step, and I greatly regret that this country is dragging its feet and sullying its credibility by means of the process that the House is now going through. The longer it takes, the less influence we shall have in shaping the Community, and the more damage will have been done to our long-term national interests.

9.45 pm

Mr. Radice: I shall argue the case for a European central bank. I believe that it is inevitable that a single market should have a single currency. There is indeed a strong case for a single currency. I was interested to hear that, although he argued against a European central bank, my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry) accepted that there were plus points in favour of a single currency. He said, rightly, that there would be a gain on transaction costs not only for businesses but for tourists and other travellers, and that a single currency would get rid of currency instability.

More important than those advantages is the fact that a single currency underwrites a single market. If currencies compete against one another and develop a system of competitive devaluation, which several of my hon. Friends seem to support, that is the surest way of destroying a single market—and it could well happen. If there is a single currency, a single monetary authority is also needed, and that is the case for a European central bank. As I shall argue, there is a strong case for such a bank to operate independently.

Of course, the political motivation behind a European central bank is that it is a way to escape from German domination of monetary policy. I know that the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) is worried about German domination of European monetary policy, and he once talked about German bankers as being like panzer generals. If he is really worried about that idea, he should support the idea of a European central bank, because that is the way to stop German domination. It would give every country in Europe a hand, a say——

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Nonsense.

Mr. Radice: Yes, it would. Would my hon. Friend like to intervene?

Mr. Gould: I shall make my own speeches.

Mr. Radice: I am glad to hear that. What I have said is not nonsense; it is true. That is why the French have been so enthusiastic about economic and monetary union. One of the weaknesses of the ERM is precisely the fact that it is dominated by German monetary policy and the German currency.

I admit that I quite like central bankers. I do not see them as demons, as my hon. Friends do. I happen to believe that, if we put a number of central bankers together, of course they will act as central bankers—but as central bankers from different countries. Over the past three weeks, I have had the experience of meeting the governors of the central banks of France, Spain and Germany, and they are all very different—[Interruption.] I did not go to the Dutch central bank, but I hope to do so. [Interruption.] I was not even offered lunch—unlike the hon. Member for East Lindsey, who was offered lunch by the Italian Foreign Minister. [Interruption.] They did not offer me lunch or dinner—[Interruption.]—and they have not gone to gaol. Neither have I—not yet, anyway.

The central bankers were all very different: they were different because they were Frenchmen, Germans and Spaniards who looked at things from their own national angle. The point about the European central bank is that it will comprise the governors of the different central banks. Over them will be an executive with eight representatives who do not have to be bankers and who will bring to the European central bank different experiences from different countries.

Mr. Cash: Would the hon. Gentleman care to examine the provisions relating to the autonomy of the central bank? Is he aware that what he has just said about the individual bankers being able to represent their national interests is directly contradicted not only by article 7 of the protocol on the central bank, which says that they may neither seek nor take instructions, but even in stage 2, in which the same applies to the central bank governors in the European Monetary Institute? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his argument is built on sand?

Mr. Radice: Of course it is not built on sand. I shall come to the issue of operational independence. It is a good principle. I see nothing wrong with the article that has been bandied about by all those who oppose Maastricht and the Community. It is a sensible way of ensuring that the bank acts independently in an operational way, as I believe it should. I do not believe that there is any other way in which it can operate if it is to be effective.

We have heard much about how terrible it is that the European central bank should have price stability as its primary objective. But what does one expect from a central bank? Surely that is what we want from a central bank. I happen to believe that there is a strong argument for price stability. People in my constituency do not like the currency to be debauched.

Mr. Gould: What about living standards?

Mr. Radice: I shall come to that in a moment, if my hon. Friend will wait.

There is nothing wrong with price stability as an objective for a central bank. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) pointed out in a notable earlier speech—I think about three months ago—the central bank operates within the much wider context of an overall economic policy that is contained in article 2. The bank is only in charge of monetary policy, and that monetary policy does not include the exchange rate.

Dr. Berry: As it is not possible to achieve price stability or zero inflation with 3 or 4 million people unemployed, how many more people would need to be unemployed and how much deeper would the recession need to be to achieve price stability? Will my hon. Friend explain that to the Committee?

Mr. Radice: If my hon. Friend wants to be entirely literal about this, he is perfectly entitled to do so. I take price stability to mean that one does not have a roaring rate of inflation. That is what the treaty is referring to.

Dr. Berry: Does my hon. Friend recognise that the phrase "price stability" does not mean other than roaring inflation? Does he take it to mean stable prices and zero inflation? How many more people must be unemployed to achieve the overriding objective of zero inflation?

Mr. Radice: As I said, my hon. Friend is being entirely literal.

Mr. Gould: That is what it says.

Mr. Radice: I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is enthusiastic about the issue. He likes to read into every word of the treaty some terrible thing that is about to happen. In fact, it does not say "zero inflation" but "price stability", and I do not see anything wrong in price stability.

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) is saying that it is proper and legitimate for price stability to be a primary goal for an independent central bank to pursue. But it is not the only goal. There are other goals and other policy imperatives, and no doubt attention will be given to them all. It is up to Ministers and other politicians to decide among those goals, but it is proper for the central bank to try to pursue that goal of price stability.

Mr. Radice: I could not put it better myself. A carefully defined set of powers will be in the hands of the central bank—[Interruption.] There are other powers—for example, on exchange rate policy—in the hands of the European Council. Fiscal policy is in the hands of nation states, except in so far as there are common rules and procedures, as there should be, if there is to be a common European policy.

Sir Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Radice: I will not give way. There is too much noise—[Interruption.]—and I would not be able to hear the hon. Gentleman.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The Committee should be courteous to the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) and listen to his words.

Mr. Radice: It has been said that economic and monetary union always works to the disadvantage of the poorer regions of Europe. That is true, which is why there is a cohesion fund and structural funds. I agree that they are not yet big enough—[Interruption.]—and there is in place a framework in which it is possible to deal with some of the disadvantages that arise from a single currency and economic and monetary union.

Much has been said about operational independence. There is a strong case for that, of which the model of the Bundesbank is a good example. Of course, the Bundesbank works from a history different from ours. It works from the experience of Weimar, when the politicians debauched the currency. That is why people in Germany are greatly concerned to have a stable price regime—[Interruption.]—and why the Bundesbank is a popular organisation. Indeed, it has been shown to be the most popular organisation in Germany. It must be said that, in Germany, bankers are more popular than politicians. I do not see anything wrong with having an independent bank or an independent European bank, and I do not see it as anti-democratic.

Like my hon. Friends, I shall argue for the strengthening of ECOFIN, a European Commission and the strengthening of the power of the European Parliament. I do not see anything wrong with operational independence or the beginnings of the accountability features in the Maastricht treaty. The question which arises is whether EMU will happen. Of course that is not certain. It is possible that competitive devaluation——

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

10.15 pm

Mr. Radice: Before I was so rudely interrupted, I was making the case for the European central bank, and I was saying that there is a strong argument for independent operation. I felt that the Bundesbank was a very effective model because, although it was operationally independent, it worked within an overall economic policy which was laid down by politicians. I argued that we should support the idea of a European central bank because, if we wanted a single market, we had to have a single currency, and if we had a single currency we would need a single monetary authority. I argued that there was a case for having an independent central bank, and in this I argued against my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry), who said that it was anti-democratic. I said that it was not necessarily anti-democratic to have an independent body set up by statute which was accountable, through reports, to the European Parliament and also to the European Council.

It is true that we cannot be certain that we will achieve economic and monetary union or that we will have a European central bank. It is quite possible that conditions in Europe will be so difficult that we will be unable to achieve economic and monetary union. It is possible that we shall enter an era of competitive devaluations. I know that some of my hon. Friends think that the great thing about economic policy is that one should devalue, and then devalue again, and then devalue again.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend should not attribute such asinine views to his hon. Friends. One should devalue when a currency is uncompetitive. The test of a competitive currency is when one can balance trading accounts in conditions of full employment and high, and sustainable, growth.

Mr. Radice: As it happens, I agree. As my hon. Friend knows, I thought that we entered the exchange rate mechanism at too high a rate, and I said so at the time. We were overvalued, and I was in favour of devaluation. However, there is a danger that, if one spends one's time talking about devaluation for one's currency, other countries will want to devalue too, which will set up a structure of competitive devaluations as countries devalue against each other. That is the danger now, and once that happens it will start to undermine the single market.

In Europe there is a strong move towards protectionism by many people, and there is a danger that the single market will be undermined and that there will be protectionism. Competitive devaluations and protectionism will result in the sort of dangerous nationalism that we had in the 1930s.

A dangerous scenario is opening up before us, and there is therefore a strong case for a single market, a single currency, a single monetary authority and a single European bank. If we do not achieve those, the forces of disruption and division will triumph in Europe and it will be a loss for all the peoples of Europe. If that happens, it will be to the cost of the people of Britain and of my constituency.

If European monetary union goes ahead, the United Kingdom must be part of it, as it would be disastrous if we were left out. The Government's opt-out policy is dangerous, and it was devised for internal party reasons to make Maastricht more palatable to the Tory party—it has not succeeded. That policy has meant that we are no longer taken seriously as a potential member of economic and monetary union, and it certainly writes us out of any prospect of geting the European central bank, or any of the European institutions, in the City of London, which will be a great loss for us.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, since the treaty was struck, more opinon in Europe has come round to the British point of view that a single currency is unlikely to be achieved within the original timetable?

Mr. Radice: I have just visited a number of European countries with the Treasury Select Committee, and that is not the case. All the other countries are committed to the single currency—even Germany, which several Conservative Members have quoted as possibly being concerned about the currency. That is not surprising, as the Germans have the most to lose. The deutschmark is the strongest currency in Europe and the German central bank runs monetary policy. If the single currency and the European central bank are created, the show will no longer be German-dominated as it is now, but even the Germans support the principle of a single currency. All they are saying is that it must go ahead on present conditions, as they do not want the European central bank to be watered down; nor do they want countries to come in to EMU if they are incapable of being in it, which seems quite sensible.

It may be right to say that, in the event, EMU will not go ahead. We cannot read the future. I am saying simply that the alternative scenario is not a good one. Competitive devaluation and protectionism, with the single market bust open, is a very worrying prospect for all of us. People's concern about that matter is one of the driving forces behind economic and monetary union. If we are really at the heart of Europe, we should be in favour of the principle of economic and monetary union. If it eventually goes ahead, we ought to be part of it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I wish that the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) could have spent a few moments in the Dining Room, where this matter was being discussed. He seems to think that Europe is a daydream land in which all the problems of the world and the nations will be solved by transferring all power and responsibility to central bodies. I wish that the hon. Gentleman could have met organisers from the port of Larne, Northern Ireland, who make the simple point that, as a result of what we are doing, competitor ports in the Republic of Ireland will receive grants of 85 per cent. to build exciting new facilities, which will achieve nothing but will steal business from Larne. The hon. Gentleman's notion that cohesion funds and structural funds will solve the problems of Europe is delusion. Things will not happen that way.

The main amendment in this group concerns article 107. The delightful Treasury Minister on the Front Bench, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, will be able to give a very speedy answer: that anyone looking at page 115 will see that article 107 does not, in the meantime, apply to the United Kingdom. On the other hand, associated with this amendment is the whole structure of what the treaty is about. In no sense is it about the harmonisation of exchange rate policies; it is about the abolition of the rights of people. What my hon. Friends should realise, even at this late hour, is that if the treaty is approved, they will have to ask themselves what on earth they are to say to the voters at the next election.

If the people are unhappy about what the central bank is doing, if they feel that its policies are creating unemployment, what will they be able to do? At present, if they are unhappy with policies, they can vote another party into office. If they are unhappy about policies in the course of a Government's term of office, they can give a warning by voting for Opposition candidates in by-elections. But when all economic policy and decisions are transferred to central constitutions that are wholly outwith the control of elected bodies, the power of the people will have been completely and utterly destroyed.

I hope that, even at this late hour, hon. Members will think seriously about what they are doing to their democracy. They are removing completely people's power to express an opinion. They are taking away people's ability to express a view. Thus, if people are unhappy about what is happening, if they feel that something is wrong and unfair, if they feel that something damaging to the economy is being done, their only means of registering opposition will be to march, demonstrate and, basically, go about destroying the democracy that we have set out to achieve.

It must be appreciated that this was not always the view of Her Majesty's Government. I listen very carefully to what our excellent Prime Minister says. On 1 July 1991, in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, he said:

> "We have made our position clear about a European central bank. If that comes about, it is many years away and it would certainly need to be accountable to a directly elected body."—[Official Report, 1 July 1991; Vol. 194, c. 25.]

The argument that we are putting forward is that it is wrong in principle to have a European central bank without any type of people's control or any mechanism for the expression of people's views. I realise that some of my hon. Friends feel that they should go into the Lobby in support of the Government because that is the right thing to do, but they should realise that we are making decisions about something far more important than the future of the Government or of the Conservative party.

We are deciding whether people should still have control over the issues in our country and whether they should still be able to warn Governments at election time. If the central bank is established and assumes all the power envisaged, and the central institutions are effectively running all the economies, basically our democracy will be dead. People should appreciate what is happening. I do not believe that people appreciate the extent to which power has already gone and our democracy has disappeared.

10.30 pm

I received a delightful letter from the Prime Minister, who has always shown great courtesy and kindness in his dealings with people who support or oppose his policies. The letter was on a small issue relating to the Sikh community of Britain. They are probably the most law-abiding and decent bunch in our community. Those good and hard-working people faced a terrible problem. In British law we have exempted them from having to wear helmets when riding motor cycles or working on building sites.

A European directive has been introduced which obliges them to wear helmets in other places such as engineering works. The British Government tried hard, on a majority vote issue, to obtain an exemption for the Sikhs. Sadly, our Government were out-voted. I wrote to the Prime Minister asking him whether—in the light of subsidiarity—he could ask the Commission to exempt the Sikhs. The answer that the Prime Minister sent to me was one of the most dreadful letters that I have received. The Prime Minister was courteous and kindly, as he always is, but he said:

"We tried very hard, but without success, to obtain a derogation . . . Raising the issue again, now the Directive is in force, could well put the existing exemption at risk."

The Prime Minister of a democratically elected country said that he dare not even approach the Commission because, if he did, the provisions that have been made for the Sikh community would disappear. That does not show the lack of concern of our delightful Prime Minister for the Sikh community of Britain. I am sure that he cares about them deeply—we saw that in the way in which he tried o fight their case. However, the Prime Minister was saying that he dare not even ask the non-elected Commission, because, if he did, the right of the Sikhs to wear their turbans on motor bikes and building sites could be at risk.

The appalling TUPE regulations will effectively destroy privatisation in Britain—a controversial issue in this country today. Those regulations were part of the acquired rights directive which was passed in 1977; they were implemented by law in 1981 with what the British Government believed to be the law of the land. They said, "This is the law—it applies to commercial undertakings." Due to infraction proceedings taken by the European Commission—an unelected body—we now find that the law will apply to all sorts of privatisations and takeovers. It means that not only will future privatisations be difficult to achieve, but every British employer who has participated in a privatisation—[Interruption.] I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) is shaking his head, but it happens to be true——

The Chairman: Order. I am having difficulty relating the hon. Gentleman's remarks to central banking. Perhaps he can help me.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I was referring to the issue as an example of the way in which our powers to influence matters have already disappeared. I was mentioning the matter briefly, not as part of my main argument. Something significant is happening to the powers of people and Parliament.

If we are concerned about the Sikhs—as we all are—there is nothing that we dare do. If we are concerned about the TUPE regulations, there is nothing that we can do. If we go ahead with the European central bank, there is nothing that we can do about basic economic policy or, more importantly, that the people can do with their votes.

Some people laugh and say, "What does it matter? Get the clever people to run things and don't give the power to the people." That is the sort of argument that people use against a referendum, when they say, "Don't let the people decide—they don't know about it." When people's power is destroyed in any country, something very important is destroyed—the basis of a peaceful community.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman suggests that all decisions will be taken by the central bank. Does he agree that Ministers who are accountable to this Parliament will have a major influence on ECOFIN? Surely it is exaggerating to suggest that all powers—the hon. Gentleman used the word "all" several times—will reside with the central bank.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. He is a conscientious attender at our debates and sincerely believes in Europe. I appeal to him to look at the duties of the central bank and at the powers that are being given to the various financial institutions such as the EMI and others. If he does that, he will see that, no matter what views or opinions are expressed, the basic policy must still be followed. I shall give an example from new clause 1—a suggestion by the Labour party that there should be an annual report to Parliament about what central banks are doing.

If that new clause is accepted and we pass a resolution that the central bank follows mad, stupid and irresponsible policies, it will have no effect of any sort, because the central bank has a legal obligation to follow the basic policies set out in the treaty. Some people say that it will not work out like that, but the treaty obliges all institutions to act in that way.

The second point that I hope hon. Members will appreciate is that, before we accept the idea that a central bank should be set up to solve all the problems and achieve low inflation—although in fairness any fool can achieve low inflation by creating 3 million unemployed—we should look at the examples of the recent miracle cures offered by the EEC.

I shall not refer in detail to the miracle cure for agriculture which was to give a fair deal to our farmers and consumers—the common agricultural policy. Despite the years in operation and all the reforms, we are now in the crazy situation where mountains of food and expenditure on the CAP are higher than they have ever been and the people are paying more than ever for their food compared with world prices. The system is a shambles and a nightmare and is not working. The same argument applies to the ERM, which is closely linked because, unfortunately, we are obliged to try to move back to fixed exchange rates when the treaty comes into force.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for showing his characteristic courtesy in giving way. He spoke about his correspondence with the Prime Minister. Has the hon. Gentleman at any time raised with the Prime Minister the likely location of the bank? Is the hon. Gentleman confident that it will be located in London with various agencies and functions carried out from a site in Edinburgh?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I have not raised that issue. When one opposes the establishment of a central bank, it is a bit devious to say, "I want it in my constituency or in London or Edinburgh." When one holds the view that the principle of a central bank that is based on policies of fixed exchange rates is bad, it would be dishonest to suggest a location for it. I am sure that many hon. Members will suggest excellent places for the bank.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): How does the ballot box affect banking? If one banks with the Hong Kong and Shanghai bank, the Bundesbank or Barclays, one is not affected by the result of a general election. Hundreds of thousands of companies in this country have to rely on the good will of banks, often to keep them afloat. My hon. Friend grossly exaggerates and clearly does not understand banking.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend and his colleagues voted for this wonderful new arrangement called the ERM on the basis that it would bring growth and stability. I know that, as a splendid and respectable person, my hon. Friend did that with sincerity—not because he was told to do so by the Whips but because he knew it was the right idea. I appeal to him to think of the unemployed. Think of the people whose houses are being repossessed as a direct result of a policy that is economic lunacy.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): That is not the fault of the exchange rate mechanism.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend says that is not the fault of the ERM. We know that the British people are having to pay a huge amount of extra cash in taxation——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman has assiduously attended the Committee, but his remarks have little to do with the issue of a central bank. Will he please address the amendments?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Certainly, Mr. Morris. Once a central bank is established, we shall be obliged to return to the ERM and fixed exchange rates. The whole principle behind the central bank is monetary union based on fixed exchange rates. That will again create unemployment and misery, because if one tries to pretend that something is not its worth, one has to distort other factors.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. Friend, as a fellow Scot, will recognise that the United Kingdom's central bank is the Bank of England. He may care to inform my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) that the Royal Bank of Scotland, the Bank of Scotland, the Clydesdale bank and all the other banks in Scotland have no say in interest rates, because they are set centrally by the Bank of England.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The argument is made that we are giving power to the people by obtaining exemption from stage 3. In fact, they will be in the same position as the people of Scotland, who have a Scottish pound note but no control over the United Kingdom's economic policy.

There is not the slightest evidence that passing over all economic power to a central bank will make matters better for the people of Britain. I have sat here treaty after treaty, night after night, debate after debate hearing about the wonderful ideas coming from the EEC that will solve problems and make life better. I wish that my hon. Friends —including those who are smiling, on the Front Bench below the Gangway—would look at Europe today. Do they see a growth in prosperity? Sadly, they see an area in structural decline and with mass unemployment. When countries such as America have steadily lowering unemployment rates, we should recognise that Europe is in structural decline. As a country stuck on the edge of that, ours would not benefit in any way.

We have tried the common agricultural policy, the ERM and other Euro-policies. When people say that a central bank is the answer, we should tell them that, on the basis of all the evidence, we do not accept it.

No one has argued in the debate that a central bank is a great idea. The European debate has changed dramatically since 1972. There always used to be a bunch of true enthusiasts who said, "This is going to be good. This is going to be great for Britain." With the arrival of the Single European Act, a good number of people still genuinely thought that it would be good for Britain. I gain the impression that very few people—apart from the small number of fanatics that one always finds in both parties —really believe that Maastricht will do any good for this country or its people.

Mr. Marlow: Surely my hon. Friend knows what has been happening in the background and in the Lobby and that the Government have been saying, "It isn't going to happen. Don't worry—there isn't going to be any monetary union. This horrible edifice isn't going to be built." If that is the case, the contract, and the legal detail —if that is what we are being asked to pass—is it not wrong that we should consider something that is nonsense and then vote for it?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Yes. I will come to that point in a second.

The Government say that if we do not give our approval, bad things will happen to Britain—that it will somehow be sidelined. We should ask ourselves whether it would make matters infinitely worse if we were prepared to say no to a central bank. Britain would be greatly strengthened. Time will tell. My hon. Friend is right to say that the arguments used now are, "Don't worry about a central bank or a single currency. It is not going to happen. It will all break down." Some people genuinely believe that.

Mr. Dykes: It will happen.

Sir Teddy Taylor: They know, for example, that fixed exchange rates can never work in the long term. There is no way in which all the countries will develop equally. The argument is made by some—including my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes)—that the problem will be solved by dumping vast amounts of money on areas that are not doing so well, to bring them all up to the same level of achievement and activity. If one looks around the world one sees that that is nonsense and does not work.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has just said, from a sedentary position, that he believes that it will go ahead. Does that reassure my hon. Friend?

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), who has consistently supported the EC, probably does believe that. I ask him to look back at what has happened to our economy, our democracy and, above all, the powers of the people since we joined the Community. I believe that some people are supporting all this nonsense because they do not believe that it will happen, but some support it because they feel that we cannot act in any other way. Those people have lost hope and they have lost faith.

10.45 pm

Even if some people think that we should go ahead with the central bank and the transfer of power to non-elected boards, councils and commissions, we have no right to do that without informing and consulting the public. It is shamefully wrong that we should push ahead a massive change in our democratic system without telling and consulting the people.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; he always shows great courtesy in that regard.

I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's arguments about democratic control. I, too, am worried about what is happening to the police, hospitals and the education system. What worries me is that I can find precious little in the Bank of England that responds democratically to the worries of my constituents in Hemsworth. The position has been the same under successive Governments of both hues.

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is the whole point. The hon. Gentleman may believe that Conservative policy on the police is rubbish and takes away democracy; that is a fair argument. He may believe that Conservative policies on education are terrible and undemocratic. He may feel that we are not using the controls of the Bank of England in the proper way. If he holds such views, however, he can go out there and fight, get people to vote for him and secure the return of a different Government who will approach things in a different way. The tragedy of the transfer of power to non-elected institutions—to boards, councils and commissions—is that, if the hon. Gentleman suddenly decides that those bodies are pursuing policies that are bad for employment and industry and dreadful for Britain, he will be able to do nothing.

Mr. Enright: Will the hon. Gentleman explain how we elect the officials of the Bank of England?

Sir Teddy Taylor: As we know, the Governor of the Bank of England is appointed by the Government of the day and economic policy is determined by the Government. The present Government have pursued certain policies which they assure us will improve the economy and, of course, we hope that they are right; but the point is that, if they are not, people can do something about it. There is something terribly dangerous and bad about the taking of all power of control from the people and the ripping out of democracy.

I ask my hon. Friends to think about this. If the Maastricht Bill goes through and a central bank is established, what on earth will they tell voters at the next election? We shall have some control over the council tax and the grammar schools; we shall have some control over the amount of income tax within a global total of taxation, which will be subject to negotiation and determination on the part of non-elected bodies. Basically, however, the power of the people will go. I believe that the creation of a central bank and the monetary policies of the EC will create mass unemployment and misery and more protectionism; I think that it will be horrible for all our people.

I may be wrong, but the crucial point is that, if we agree to the Bill, what we had will have gone for ever. We shall not be able to sit down suddenly and say, "Let us change all this: it is not working." Sadly, we know from our experience of the common agricultural policy that policies do not simply get changed, particularly when many countries feel that they are doing very well out of them and getting lots of money.

I hope that we shall use the amendment not to try to score party points, but to persuade ourselves that something huge, important and significant is happening to our democracy. We have no right to allow that unless we are convinced that it will benefit our people—or, more important, unless we have given the people a chance to decide for themselves.

Mr. Shore: Like other hon. Members, I shall say something about the independence of the European central bank because it merits considerable discussion; but, before I do, I wish to mention the concept of the central bank and a single currency. The two clearly go together: we shall not have a central bank unless we are to have a single currency.

I am wholly unconvinced about the case for a single currency, which is central to the whole argument. It would be a serious mistake if we were to allow ourselves to be absorbed into a single currency, partly because of the difficult issue of convergence. We have had debates about convergence, purely monetarist indicator convergence and what we sometimes call convergence in real economic aggregates.

There is one particular difficulty about convergence. Let us suppose that, at one particular point in time, it could be arranged that all the countries which were potential or candidate members to join the single currency were all enjoying balance of payments equilibrium, full employment and other ideal circumstances. Even if it were possible at that moment to set up a single currency, it could not last. The conditions would change, and we all know the reasons. There is a dynamic working with different force and at a different speed in different parts of the vast area which would be formed in western Europe, and including the United Kingdom. The factors operating in different countries, and perhaps in different regions, are so clearly visible that the dream of a single currency looks like a nightmare when we start to consider the consequences of being locked into a single currency when there are differential rates of growth.

I did a simple calculation about relative movements in the growth of gross domestic product in the seven major economies of the western world. I took 1989 as 100 for all of them. By the end of this year, the estimates are as follows: France, which starts as 100 in 1989, reaches 107 by the end of 1993; Germany, which startes at 100, ends at 111; Japan, which also starts at 100, ends at 114; but the United Kingdom, which started at 100 in 1989, will be 99 at the end of 1993. Within four years, there is a spread of rates of growth, ranging from 14 per cent. for Japan and minus 1 per cent. for Britain. That could be different at different times, or we may do much better.

However, if there were no means of adjusting the rate of exchange of the yen and the pound—if they were frozen together—the consequences for the pound and the United Kingdom would be very severe. Throughout the history of the world economy as it has developed, there have always been movements and adjustments between currencies. There must be, otherwise there would be no tolerable way of making adjustments other than accepting that in the areas that are doing less well than others there would be constantly rising unemployment, whereas in the areas of great prosperity there would be ever-increasing investment. There would be an ever-increasing movement of people from the depressed areas to the areas that were doing well.

We know all this from our experience in our own country over the years. In the past we have had to use powerful instruments of regional policy to correct the tendency. The alternative would have been to let the south of England drain the north, Scotland and a large part of Wales, and let people crowd into the south—as happened to a large extent in the inter-war years.

If there is a single currency in Europe, inevitably there will be a differential rate of growth. We know where the strongest economy in the European Community is located —it is still in Germany, and when Germany has absorbed the former East Germany it will be the super-economy of the European continent. The effect of that on the United Kingdom and on other economies that are not as powerful, and are not growing as fast, will be as I have described. They will experience either rising unemployment or a substantial movement of their people and their investment to the areas of greatest growth.

Mr. Dickens: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that convergence would be well-nigh impossible? I do not believe that there is a snowball's chance in hell of there being a single currency. The difficulties are compounded by the fact that, with more countries coming into the European Community, the criteria will not allow for convergence so easily, and the numbers complicate things further. I do not believe that we would ever get into that situation. Even if we did, we should of course maintain the opt-out clause—but I do not believe that we would ever have to use it.

Mr. Shore: It would not be impossible for those events to happen—although it would be foolish to allow them to happen.

In discussing the amendments, we must assume that the option to enter a single currency has been exercised—otherwise the debate would be rather unreal. I agree that that involves a hypothesis, and there is still a big question mark over it. In 1996, or whenever the moment of choice arrived, would the Government opt for a single European currency? Would they want to? In view of some of the criteria for opting in, would they be able to? I do not want to develop that argument now, because it would lead us back into another debate, about the transition—but what I fear most is that the Government may make a serious effort to opt in, which would involve a calamitous squeeze on the British economy. We know the problems that our economy is facing now, and from the financial statement we know what the prospects are for the next four or five years.

The conclusion to which I am coming is familiar to others who have addressed the problem. There may be a single currency, but there will be differential rates of growth and of prosperity. Therefore, either there will be a disastrous situation in the less prosperous and less dynamic regions, or there will have to be an enormously powerful regional policy.

With the best will in the world, there is not the will within the EC for a powerful regional policy. I know that the optimists in the Opposition will say, "Over the years we shall try to develop regional policy and try to pretend that we really all are absolutely identical in our motives and our feelings about each other. We shall come to the conclusion that our feelings about Italy, Greece and so on are exactly the same as our feelings today about our fellow countrymen." That may be a worthy ideal, but it is not the reality. It is difficult enough to sustain a strong regional policy in this United Kingdom.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Does my right hon. Friend accept not only that that is unlikely but that, if it happened, we would still be the second largest contributor unless the problem of redistribution was tackled so that contributions were measured in terms of ability to pay?

11 pm

Mr. Shore: That is absolutely right. The whole question of the criteria governing existing regional policy would need to be looked at and, indeed, changed, because that policy is built on objective 1 areas, which are receiving or will receive substantial assistance. Other areas of great need and rapid industrial change get very little regional assistance, and that assistance is not likely to increase.

I have made my point about the difficulty of sustaining a powerful regional policy within a single country. The difficulty of operating a really serious regional policy covering the whole of the half-continent of western Europe will be very much greater.

The only person ever to make a serious study of the problem was Sir Donald MacDougall, a most distinguished economist, who was chief economic adviser to the CBI and, before that, director-general of the Department of Economic Affairs. Donald concluded that one would need a shift of resources equal to 7 per cent. of the Community's GDP. The total European budget is about 1·2 per cent. and the regional fund accounts for about 15 per cent. of that sum. So we are talking about a sum 30, 40 or 50 times greater than what is now available in the enhanced structural funds that have existed since the European Single Act was passed.

The truth is that the enhancement of those funds was to take account of the introduction of a single European market. There has been no enhancement, and no proposal for the enhancement, of regional and structural funds to take account of the progress towards a single currency.

Mr. Hoon: The cohesion fund?

Mr. Shore: I accept that, but that was part of the whole package to get four particular countries, which were rather like client states, to take a favourable view. [Interruption.] I invite hon. Members to turn their mind to the meeting in Edinburgh and what Mr. Felipe Gonzalez was trying to achieve. Having established in principle the idea of a fund, he wanted a great deal for Spain—and he got it. The Spanish side of the bargain was, "If we don't get this, we will not give our approval."

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend always advances a very logical argument. He talked about differential rates of growth. There are already differential rates of growth in each nation state—for example, the London area grows faster than the regions. That partly explains why unemployment is higher in the regions than has historically been the case in the capital city. The right hon. Gentleman would not, for one moment, blame that on the fact that the United Kingdom, like every other member state, has a single currency.

If I followed my right hon. Friend correctly, part of the justification of his argument was that such matters turn upon balance of payment flows and on the deficits created where some countries are growing faster than others. If there were a single currency, there would not be any purpose in calculating balance of payments deficits. We do not calculate the balance of payments deficit as between London and the north. We make no careful calculation of the movement of goods. My concern about my right hon. Friend's impeccably logical analysis is that it operates from the existing system and presupposes that the position would not be significantly different after the introduction of a single currency.

Mr. Shore: That is an interesting point. My hon. Friend is quite correct in saying that the balance of payments problem, which reflects inbalances of economic performance, would not be visible in a single currency. But the underlying consequences would be the same. Unless there was a correction of some kind—an increase in resources put in—there would be an increase in unemployment in and a movement of people out of areas that were not doing well. We would lose, as it were, the danger signal of a balance of payments deficit. We would not be aware of the physical problems until a disastrous slump was upon us.

Mr. Bill Walker: For nearly 300 years, we in the United Kingdom have operated a single currency and a single bank. During periods of economic difficulty, the discontent and unhappiness felt by people in the regions soon made itself manifest to their parliamentary representatives. We have democratic control here, so we are able to act quickly in such circumstances.

A single currency and a single bank, with the absence of democratic accountability, is not the answer. The people of Britain can complain to, and about, us and there is the ability to change Governments, sometimes at relatively short notice. That represents a balancing factor, for at times we have moved people from poor to wealthy areas and have transferred vast amounts of taxpayers' money from wealthy to poor areas. We have been doing that for nearly 300 years, and the facts are there to be seen.

Mr. Shore: That raises the whole question of what is a community. We refer often to the European Community, but I am not sure that it is a community in the same sense that, for example, the United Kingdom is a community. We feel closer because they are our own people, and we are prepared to do more for them—as we are prepared to do more for our families—than we are prepared to do for others.

That does not mean that we shall be pig-headedly obstinate or ungenerous in our dealings with others. On the contrary, I hope that we shall be very generous. But it is no good pretending that there is the same degree of commitment and sense of genuine community and union between the countries of Europe as there is within each country. We must bear that in mind, particularly when we are talking about the need to transfer major resources to compensate for the effects of a single currency.

Mr. Enright: Does my right hon. Friend recall some of the difficulties he had when Secretary of State for the Environment? For example, when I chaired the West Yorkshire planning and transportation committee, we had some negotiations with him. I remember the way in which I thought he and his colleagues conducted a very centralised administration. I did not realise how little centralised it was until the Conservatives took control. Even so, the response we got was carefully noted in the region.

I suggest that many of the disparities in the regions are recognised more as a result of what is happening in Europe now—because it is essentially a Europe of the regions—than as a result of what is happening in central Government. Much the same applies when we are in power, although slightly modified, or the Conservatives are in office.

[Mr. Enright]

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend gives a strange viewpoint. Perhaps it reflects past insensitivities. In an earlier ministerial experience, when Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, I was responsible for regional policy. We had a picture, a map, of the whole country showing the state of employment and unemployment and the future commitment of new work into every travel-to-work area throughout the United Kingdom. We put enormous resources into a powerful economic regional policy. In addition to the old development areas, we had special development areas and intermediate areas. Later, as Secretary of State for the Environment, I was involved in putting resources into the inner cities, which had been neglected for too long.

We were able to do that because we had the knowledge, the information, the commitment and a sense of being one political community. We used the strength where we were strong to help weak areas in our country. That is natural; it is what one expects. That is the real meaning of community. The European Community is a different sort of community.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Would the right hon. Gentleman reflect on the experience of the United States, which created a single market among the states of America? The number of states increased over 100 years. A single currency among the states was not established until 100 years after the formation of a single market and the free movement of people. A single currency and a central federal bank were established because one currency became paramount—it became so strong that all the states decided that it would be better to have one currency and trade without the problems which resulted from the differential exchange rates among the states rather than continuously adjust them.

It seems that exactly the same process will take place in Europe because the deutschmark will become the common currency. With the common currency in the hands of the Germans, and with the Bundesbank under its present constitution—which involves currency stability only within the borders of German—we would have absolutely no say about or influence over monetary policy throughout Europe. Therefore, it is essential that we establish a central bank and a single currency which we can influence through democratic institutions.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. This is a long intervention. The hon. Member's point has been made.

Mr. Shore: The comparison with the United States is not helpful to us. There are so many obviously special circumstances in the history of the United States that one cannot make an easy comparison between what happened there and what may happen in western Europe. A factor which we cannot leave out when we look at the United States is that it has a single Government, a single central bank and a single currency.

I know that some Labour Members long for such a fulfilment and development. However, that is not the line taken by those on the Labour Front Bench—not publicly, at any rate—or the Government Front Bench. Without that fulfilment and development, we will face serious problems, as the more honest federalists in the Labour party are willing to acknowledge.

Mr. Marlow: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Shore: I will not give way because I want to move on.

Mr. Leighton: In addition to the original policies of the sort over which my right hon. Friend presided when he was Secretary of State, it is not the case that public expenditure is redistributed in nation states because richer people and richer areas pay in more and draw out less, and poorer people and poorer areas pay in less and draw out more in benefits? Is it not also the case that local government expenditure by rate support grants is redistributed and consists of transferred payments from richer areas to poorer areas?

Public expenditure in nation states is about 40 per cent., but the budget in the European Community is only slightly more than 1 per cent., most of which goes on agriculture. We are not comparing like with like. Public expenditure is minuscule and inadequate to overcome the damage which will be done by a single currency.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and it is relevant to the argument. When I think about the transfers which take place in the United Kingdom as a matter of course through rate support grants and so on, I sometimes say to myself that MacDougall, in his 7 per cent. of gross domestic product, greatly underestimated the sums which are needed. They are much less than the sums which are dispersed through the federal Government of the United States to the different states which make up the union. We have established that point.

The independence of the European central bank has been the subject of considerable discussion already. I have made it clear that I believe that the single currency idea is basically flawed. That is my position. I am holding on to that. I understand that many hon. Members are interested in the question whether a European central bank should be independent, more or less on the German model, or should be brought under ECOFIN.

11.15 pm

It is not necessary to read article 107 again. No one who attaches any importance to the meaning of words can doubt the strength of the commitment to an independent central bank. It is extraordinary. Not only shall the bank not seek or take instructions from Community or national institutions, but the Governments and the Community institutions

"undertake to respect this principle and"— almost unbelievably—

"not to seek to influence the members of the decision-making bodies".

That declaration of independence goes far beyond anything which affects the federal bank in Washington or any other independent bank that I have ever heard of. The words are almost unbelievable, but they are part of the treaty and have all the authority of the treaty. They have the authority that they may be interpreted, if need be, by the European Court of Justice. That is why provisions are put into treaties.

"not to seek to influence"

Mr. Radice: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shore: Not for a moment. I want to develop the point further.

I find the provision in article 107 extraordinary. My hon. Friends find it difficult to cope with. They know that it is wrong. They know that such a separation is unacceptable to them because they have intellectual honesty. They know that they cannot accept it because it is intolerable and ridiculous to hand such power to independent bankers. They have to continue pretending that it is a mistake—perhaps a misprint in the text. We heard some of that today.

My hon. Friends have a considerable record in saying that they would never accept a provision such as article 107. The famous document "Meet the Challenge: Make the Change" did not acknowledge the concept of economic and monetary union. It dealt mainly with the exchange rate mechanism. My hon. Friends may say that that was in 1989. What about 1990? Another document went to annual conference then and received whatever approval one obtains there. It said:

"premature monetary union would damage Britain . . . The bank, which will be responsible for the day-to-day management of monetary policy, should be statutorily accountable to ECOFIN for meeting its monetary objectives."

The principle was stated with clarity.

A similar pledge was made in a later document in 1991. Those were the policy statements of the Labour party up to the 1991 annual conference, the last before the election. We still maintained that it would be intolerable to have a European central bank which was not controlled by a powerful ECOFIN. Now things have changed. Things were slipped out of the national executive and joint meetings of the shadow Cabinet and the national executive in the run-up to the election.

As we know, there was no further annual conference, so the new absurdity is that, apparently, at its last annual meeting, the party agreed to accept it on the ground that it was the best thing we could get. However, it is a major change from the commitments of the past three years. I well understand that my hon. Friends feel uneasy and that leads them to make assumptions about the treaty that are far from the truth.

I do not wish to subject to detailed criticism the proposition that we need a powerful ECOFIN to control the otherwise independent bank, but let us take it at face value. Do we want that?

The treaty contains the opposite of what we want, with all the entrenched authority of a treaty commitment. Some of my hon. Friends say that it simply requires political will, with a powerful new Labour Government storming into Brussels and saying, "We want ECOFIN. We want to bring that great institution under our control." I do not know who they would find as their allies in that task. I am afraid that there will be no French socialist Government available in the next few years. I do not think that there will be a French socialist President for very much longer, so we will find no allies there. According to all accounts, even when we had those allies they were not very successful in getting their way with the other partners in the European Community.

Mr. Marlow: It is worse than the right hon. Gentleman says. It would not matter if that exciting, new, dynamic Labour Government were to rush across to Brussels with those ideas. The Commission would have to propose and the European Parliament would have to agree before any changes could be introduced.

Mr. Shore: Indeed, there are many complications. The basic point is that there has been no evidence whatsoever of any substantial body of opinion in the Governments of the present member states in favour of a powerful ECOFIN to which the European central bank is to be made responsible. It simply is not there. Instead, we have the overriding view of the Germans—and it is above all a German institution. As the Germans are deeply afraid of inflation following their appalling experience in the 1920s, we have the most anti-inflationary structure for the bank and the greatest independence for it written into the treaty, in contrast to the wishes of my hon. Friends.

What we have heard from the Labour Front Bench and from a number of Back Benchers is simply wishful thinking. They want it to happen, but it is not there. The opposite is there and they cannot deny it.

We had a reminder of the absurdities and costs of the common agricultural policy. When something is in a treaty —the CAP is in the treaty of Rome—and buttressed by regulations, it takes a great deal to get rid of it.

As long as I have been in politics we have been reforming the common agricultural policy. What about the Mansholt plan? Remember him? Great things were to come from that. There have been wonderful arrangements every decade. We have come back in triumph from negotiations saying that at least we shall put an end to the surpluses, the wine lakes and so on. What has happened? Where are we? We still have the CAP; it is jeered at and laughed at throughout the world, except where it causes considerable pain because it is protectionist and does such damage. It is an absurdity of a policy, but it remains.

When something is written into a European treaty, it takes almost an earthquake to get it out agin, so my hon. Friends should not pretend that there is no substance, weight or authority in what is written into the text of a treaty. Unless they are prepared to face that fact, they are not doing much credit to themselves or to any serious discussion of what is involved.

Mr. Enright: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way yet again, but may I remind him that it was during the tenure of his Government and his Government's negotiations—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ours."] I was certainly in the party at that time and I supported the party, but I was not, alas, a member of the Government. It was a Government of which my right hon. Friend was a member which negotiated access to the sugar market for British sugar beet farmers, resulting in huge excesses of sugar which continue today, to the detriment of the third world. I deplored it then, and I deplore it now.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think that we need develop an argument on sugar. We are discussing the central bank.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend has not, frankly, recorded accurately the history of those years.

I was going on to deal with the desperate plight of my hon. Friends in trying to prove that ECOFIN will be in charge of the European central bank. They are in great difficulties. When they have reached the end of their tether, as it were, when the last possible argument has been produced and dismissed by better information, what do they say? It is fascinating. They say that we may be right, but that it really does not matter anyway because we have no freedom with our interest rates and exchange rate, that we are dominated by the Germans—we have heard this from all sides—or the Americans or whatever. It really does not matter, they say, that we are transferring one of the great instruments of macro-economic policy to an unelected, unaccountable institution in Europe. We are transferring the power to set our own interest rates and our own exchange rate, and they say that it does not matter. It is not just recently that they have been saying it; they have been saying for the past couple of years that we will have no power over our own interest rates and our own exchange rate.

We know what the answer to that is. Some members of the Government may have shared that view at some stage, but events are a marvellous tutor, and the events on what some hon. Gentlemen call "white Wednesday" in September 1992 showed us that there is a freedom. It is not, of course, a freedom to lower one's interest rates to the point of oblivion. We cannot go right down from 10 per cent., I think it was, before we added the 5 on the fatal day, to 3 per cent., because there are world factors and influences to be taken into account. But there is a big difference between being, as we were on 13 September, 2 per cent. higher than German interest rates and being, as we are today, at least 2 per cent. lower than German interest rates. That is quite a margin of freedom.

If anyone doubts it, let him talk to British industries, which are now borrowing money at much better rates than they were able to do six or nine months ago, and ask whether they would prefer to be a firm in France, where the bank rate is not 6 per cent. but 12 per cent., holding the "franc fort", looking the deutschmark in the face, and accepting for an incredibly long time quite unacceptably high employment, almost the same as our own, 3 million. Frankly, was what happened last Sunday surprising? It should be a lesson for socialists everywhere.

Mr. Gould: My right hon. Friend makes a powerful case, but one can add to it. He will recall that before 16 September we were solemnly assured that withdrawing from the exchange rate mechanism would not give us greater freedom to set our own interest rates and that if we dared to break the arrangement interest rates would have to rise. Does my right hon. Friend recall that advice, and what does he think of it?

11.30 pm

Mr. Shore: Yes, I remember hearing that. Undoubtedly, people had that anxiety. I do not think that it was very rational, but, frankly, the Treasury has not been very good at judging or forecasting matters affecting the exchange rate or interest rates.

When we entered the ERM in October 1990, I remember saying—this is not hindsight—that I was convinced that it was the wrong rate; and I am not a great currency expert. From what I could see of the pre-fixed exchange rate and the performance of the British economy, especially in terms of its balance of trade deficit, it seemed self-evident that it was wrong. But the Treasury went ahead, and in written and oral answers to my questions I was assured that the most expert people had been consulted, and different authorities had suggested that entry was right. I am afraid that they were wrong, and they were also wrong about their estimates of the effects on interest rates and other things of getting the pound out of the ERM.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the "independence" of the new European central bank, but is he not misguided in using that word? Does he not mean that it is unaccountable? Bearing in mind the huge powers that the bank will have to control the economies of all the countries that comprise the European Community, and given the fact that its policies to deal with and to limit deficits could create massive unemployment in certain parts of the Community, will it not undermine democracy and accountability? As several hon. Members have said, perhaps it will force the people of this country reluctantly to take to the streets to exercise the democratic rights which the body will deny them.

Mr. Shore: The hon. Gentleman is correct. The bank will be both unaccountable and independent.

The political authorities will be totally incapable of influencing the top management of the European central bank. I remind the House that the four executive members of its board and the chairman and vice-chairman are to be appointed for a one-term, eight-year period. Even the most timid people are likely to be very independent in their judgment if they are appointed on such generous terms. One cannot be reappointed, so it is no good sucking up to people or assisting them in any way. The executives are meant to be independent and one could not conceive of any arrangement that could make them more so. That is written into the protocol on the European central bank.

An adjacent matter is also very important. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) was absolutely right: okay, we will have an unaccountable central bank. What are its terms of reference and what has it been asked to do? Article 105 states:

"The primary objective of the ESCB"—

European system of central banks—

"shall be to maintain price stability."

I do not want to go over all the previous arguments about that, but it is the deflationary heart of the treaty, and it reflects German historical experience and their insistence on those terms of reference before they would agree to the treaty. That clause is very important.

Let me return to article 2, which contains a general statement. I know that the phrase "high unemployment" is used three times in the treaty, because my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) corrected me when I said that it was used only twice. Nobody can possibly say that this is not very important. But the faith of my hon. Friends in article 2 is rather misplaced, for another reason. Article 2 must be read in conjunction with article 3a. I do not know whether hon. Members have had a chance to look at the latter. As it is highly relevant, I shall quote it. Paragraph 1 says:

"For the purposes set out in Article 2"—

including high employment and all these other lovely things—

"the activities of the Member States and the Community shall include, as provided in this Treaty . . . the adoption of an economic policy which is based on the close co-ordination of Member States' economic policies".

Paragraph 3 says:

"These activities of the Member States and the Community shall entail compliance with the following guiding principles".

What do hon. Members think those guiding principles are? A high level of employment? One looks in vain for that. The principles stated are stable prices, sound public finances and monetary conditions and a sustainable balance of payments. One does not find there much encouragement for those who have pinned their faith on article 2. As I said earlier, we should take article 2 more seriously if there were a 10-page protocol on full employment in the European Community.

Mr. Mandelson: My right hon. Friend is right to draw attention to these provisions. Indeed, I have the page flagged and intended to quote from it if given the opportunity. My right hon. Friend refers to sound public finances and a sustainable balance of payments. Why does that give rise to such horror? Why should we, instead, be in favour of unsound public finances and an unsustainable balance of payments?

Mr. Shore: There is no doubt that a sustainable balance of payments is crucial. However, the factors that are picked out here are ones that curtail employment, rather than help to create it. Nobody, except perhaps the Germans, has ever had stable prices and full employment. Sound public finances mean a public sector borrowing requirement of less than 3 per cent. of gross domestic product. And what are sound monetary conditions? Tight money? Certainly, and monetary discipline. I want to find the things that my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) would have been delighted to find. If there had been a preference to high employment, would he not have waved his papers in the air and rejoiced? Such a reference would have given a little credibility to his faith in article 2.

Mr. Betts rose——

Mr. Shore: I shall not give way. I want to come to a conclusion.

These are not very encouraging guiding principles for people concerned with the achievement of high rates of growth and low rates of unemployment.

I want to put to the Minister a question about article 19 of the protocol in respect of the statute of the ESCB. This seems to give the central bank power to demand minimum reserves for banks and other financial institutions. I have not had an explanation of what is entailed. Is the point that, in order to secure what the bank considers to be sound monetary conditions, it could, like the Bank of England in times past, call up deposits from commercial banks, to be non-interest-bearing and frozen as part of a tight money policy? I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary would explain that—not necessarily now, but when he makes his speech.

Article 108 is a simple little article that states:

"Each Member State shall ensure, at the latest at the date of the establishment of the ESCB, that its national legislation including the statutes of its national central bank is compatible with this Treaty and the Statute of the ESCB."

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) will have swallowed hard and put on a brave face when he reached that disagreeable item.

When the Labour majority Government came to power in 1945, the first thing it did—virtually with the assent of the then Opposition—was to place, not just in public ownership but in Treasury control, the Bank of England. If I can recall one or two of the phrases that we used then, I think that we said that it was to finance the servant, not the master, of the nation. That was the sort of approach that we took, and we meant it. We meant to take over those factors that greatly influenced the lives of our people. I find it difficult to detect any vestige of the socialist tradition in those of my hon. Friends who are cheerfully contemplating handing over the power of democratic control through our democratically elected Government and Chancellor here to an unelected bank in Europe. I think that such an attitude is utterly deplorable, and I hope that the Labour party will rethink what it is doing.

Can anyone envisage the circumstances in which the next Labour Government would come before the House and, in its first Bill, repeal the Bank of England Act 1946 and formally renounce the power to control this country's monetary system? We would die of shame. I am certain that many people in the Labour party would never accept it.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The group of amendments addresses the institutional implications of those sections of the treaty which deal with the possibility of the establishment of a single currency. Much of the debate has proceeded on the assumption that there will come into force and apply in this country a European system of central banks which will operate a single currency in this country. I shall return to those arguments later.

First, however, I wish to pick up an issue raised by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). He said that for the debate to proceed on such a basis would be to make a substantial leap of logic. The success of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at Maastricht means that the House is not being asked now to accept the proposition that a single currency should be circulating in this country or that the institutions set out in the treaty should come into force to operate that single currency. As a result of the British protocol negotiated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that decision will be made later. That is not the issue before the House today.

Mr. Andrew Smith: In the light of what the Minister has said, may I ask if he is aware of the article written by the Prime Minister when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in The Irish Times on 6 July 1990? He wrote:

"There is no more important issue facing the European Community than the path we choose towards economic and monetary union. We are all committed to that goal."

Are the Government still committed to that goal?

Mr. Dorrell: The goal of economic and monetary union has been accepted by EC member states since the early 1970s. The issue is the precise form that the union will take. The treaty sets out a form of monetary union and contains the British position on that form—that under the terms of the British protocol we are not bound to introduce a single currency.

Mr. Marlow: If there is monetary union does that not mean that there will be a single currency?

11.45 pm

Mr. Dorrell: No. That is precisely why in the run-up to the Maastricht negotiations we proposed not a single currency system but a common currency which within a monetary union would allow a range of different currencies to circulate. That is why we have not accepted a commitment to a single currency. We do not accept that commitment to monetary union necessarily implies a commitment to introduce a single currency.

Mr. [illegible]lands: Why in 1993 do we have to write into our domestic legislation all stages 1, 2 and 3 articles and all the protocols? Why not do that in 1996?

Mr. Dorrell: As the Government made clear in another context, in the Bill, as in earlier legislation to introduce treaty obligations to our domestic law, it is more sensible to legislate for all the implications which might arise from the treaty. That lies behind the drafting of the Bill.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Dorrell: Perhaps my hon. Friend would allow me to answer the question put to me. It is more sensible to introduce into our legislation the provisions which would be necessary if we exercised the choice provided for by the British protocol. That is in line with the manner in which we have legislated for treaty obligations in the past.

Mr. Spearing: I think that the Minister asserted that the commitment or obligation to economic and monetary union went back to the early 1970s. I do not recall any such commitment in the European Community debates in 1972. My recollection and that of my hon. Friends is that the Government referendum document of 1975 specifically stated that the threat of economic and monetary union had been removed. I do not recall any Conservative denying that. What was the commitment of the early 1970s?

Mr. Dorrell: The amendments concern the institutional arrangements for the operation of a single currency. At the time of the referendum the argument was not that there was no further Community interest in economic and monetary union—that would have been a hard argument to advance—but that if there was to be a decision to introduce economic and monetary union it would require at the very least unanimity in the Council. Any significant move down the road of such union would involve a treaty amendment, which is precisely what we are debating.

Mr. Mandelson: The point about the early 1970s is rather fine and arcane. More relevant is the position of the Prime Minister. For the benefit of those who are following the debate it would be worth clarifying the answer the Minister gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who quoted from an article in The Irish Times of Friday 6 July written by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, now the Prime Minister:

"There is no more important issue facing the European Community than the path we choose towards economic and monetary union. We are all committed to that goal."

The Minister says that that is enshrined in the Maastricht treaty, but the Government take a separate position within the treaty. Presumably the Prime Minister has changed the view that he expressed in 1990—or does he now hold a minority position in his own Government?

Mr. Dorrell: I did not say that the position was set out only in the Maastricht treaty. I said that we accept the commitment to economic and monetary union, to which this country has signed up several times—including in the early 1970s. We do not accept that the only way to deliver monetary union in Europe is by introducing a single currency. That is why my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Lawson, who is not a supporter of a single currency, proposed to the Community that we should introduce provision for a common currency regime which would allow currencies to circulate within the Community on the basis of a monetary union, but without the introduction —and certainly without the imposition—of a single currency. There is no inconsistency about that.

Mr. Budgen: Can my hon. Friend say whether the Government are committed to moving back into a system of irrevocably locked exchange rates?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend does not accurately describe either the history or the present commitment involved in the exchange rate mechanism. It is true that it is Government policy to return to membership of the exchange rate mechanism when the Government believe that it is in this country's interest to do so.

Mr. Budgen: Are we committed to going back to irrevocably locked exchange rates?

Mr. Dorrell: The answer is no. I understood my hon. Friend to ask whether we are committed to returning to ERM membership when it is in this country's interest to do so. The answer to that question is yes.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend the Minister said that we are committed to economic and monetary union but that that does not necessarily mean to a single currency—but if one examines the treaty, the only option is a single currency. The Government are committed to the treaty and to economic and monetary union. How can there be economic and monetary union at a later stage without the treaty having a single currency? What alternative is available to the Government?

Mr. Dorrell: I explained twice the Government's preferred option in terms of a route to monetary union.

Mr. Marlow: But that is not in the treaty.

Mr. Dorrell: It is not in the treaty, but neither is any obligation to join a single currency in the treaty. It contains commitments for this country, but a commitment to join a single currency is not numbered among them.

I was asked to give chapter and verse on the commitment in the early 1970s to economic and monetary union. Member states signed up to that at their conference in Paris between 19 and 21 October 1972.

Mr. Leighton: The Minister mentioned Britain's commitment in the early 1970s to economic and monetary union and the referendum. The 1975 manifesto of the Government of the day stated:

"There was a threat to employment in Britain from the movement in the Common Market towards an Economic and Monetary Union. This could have forced us to accept fixed exchange rates for the pound, restricting industrial growth and so putting jobs at risk. This threat has been removed."

Mr. Dorrell: As I have already pointed out, I do not feel responsible for that Government in a collective sense. The position in 1975—it remains the same now—was that no form of monetary union could be imposed on the country other than as a result of a treaty amendment, which would clearly require the consent not merely of the Government but of the House in the context of debates such as this.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I should like to make some progress on the question which has provided the substance of the debate—the institutional arrangements which would be necessary if we moved to a single currency.

The question which underlies the Bill is this. Other sovereign countries in Europe have expressed an interest—some, indeed, have gone well beyond that—in introducing a single currency as the means of delivering our collective commitment to monetary union. The question that we in Britain must answer is whether, when other member states of the Community are choosing to take that course, we should repeat the mistake—as I regard it—that our forefathers made at the time of the Messina conference. Should we stand out from the process in which those member states are engaged—the designing of a single currency—or take advantage of the opportunity that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister won for this country at Maastricht, which sets this process apart from the process started at Messina, and assist in the design of a single currency which may come into force in the rest of the Community?

That is the question that the House must decide. The question is not, "Do we want to accept a single currency?" and still less, "Do we want to accept the institutional arrangements set out in the treaty?" Those are questions to which the House will return as a result of the passage of the Bill. The question with which we have to deal tonight is whether, if there is to be a single currency, the arrangements set out in the Bill are sensible for the management of such a currency, which would circulate in 12 independent member states.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend has raised the question of the common currency. Does he agree that, if it is our long-standing wish to move towards economic and monetary union, a common currency can only be a delaying mechanism? Does he agree that, if we are to honour the ultimate obligation, such a currency must lead to a single currency, which is the necessary condition for monetary union?

Mr. Dorrell: Let me say for the third time—in what has been, so far at least, a relatively short speech—that I do not accept that proposition. I continue to believe that a different route for the delivery of monetary union would involve the circulation within the Community of common, as opposed to single, currencies.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No, I want to move on.

Let me return to the subject which has provided the purpose of the debate and answer the question whether the institutional arrangements set out in the treaty are sensible for the management of a single currency. We must at least allow the possibility that a single currency will be introduced. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney made it abundantly clear—as, indeed, did my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) and one or two others—that he was against the establishment of a single currency, however managed. If that is the basis on which the discussion is to take place, it will be a wholly academic discussion.

If we are to pursue the argument about what the institutional arrangements could be if a single currency were established—if we chose to join such a currency at a later date, as a result of the opportunity provided for us by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at Maastricht—let us examine what the arrangements could be for the management of that currency.

12 midnight

From the point of view of our history, we are starting with a relatively clean sheet of paper. If we are to answer the question, how do we best manage a single currency starting from a clean sheet of paper, we would do well to set out a few trig points for the argument, as I shall do now.

The first proposition is self-evident. If there is to be a single currency which circulates in the 12 member states of the Community, we have to set up not only the single currency but the monetary authority which will be responsible for managing that single currency. The second proposition is that, if it is to circulate in 12 sovereign member states, that monetary authority—[HON. MEMBERS: "They will no longer be sovereign states."] My hon. Friends may have a view about that.

If the currency is to circulate in the 12 member states of the Community and as there can be only one monetary authority, it follows as night follows day that that monetary authority must be separate from the political institutions of any individual member state. No member state will accept a currency in circulation within its borders which is managed by institutions within the body politic of a different member state. We therefore have to design a monetary authority which is separate from the member states.

My third proposition is that, even when we are designing a monetary authority which is separate from the member states, we should seek to apply the principle of subsidiarity. If monetary authority is to be removed from member states and passed to a single monetary authority, it does not follow that other economic decision-making needs to be removed from the member state level. To manage a single currency across 12 member states, it is certainly necessary to take monetary authority away from member states, but I do not accept that it is necessary or, indeed, desirable, within the principle of subsidiarity, to remove fiscal policy or wider economic policy responsibility from member states.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I wish to develop this point; then I will give way to my hon. Friend.

This is one of the fundamental disagreements that I have with my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey and the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) who argue that, if there is to be a single monetary authority, it follows that it must have responsibility for fiscal policy decisions all around the Community. I do not accept that that is technically necessary. At a technical level, it is simply wrong and certainly not provided for within the treaty.

The treaty provides limits, which we shall discuss on a later group of amendments, to the range of policy options open to member states as fiscal authorities—that is where the budget deficit criteria comes into play—but it does not remove from member states the responsibility for fiscal policy. That rests with member states. If there is to be a single currency, the only aspect of economic policy which it is necessary to remove from member states is responsibility for monetary policy.

Mr. Wilkinson: How on earth, in the real world, could it be possible to have a single monetary authority conducting monetary policy on behalf of the union while the constituent elements of the union pursue their independent fiscal policy? Surely that is a recipe for total economic confusion.

Mr. Dorrell: With great respect, I do not think that that is true. It is wrong at a technical level. [Interruption.] One of my hon. Friends queries my use of the word "technical". The conduct of monetary policy is, in large measure, a technical matter. There is the question of accountability, of course, with which I shall deal in a moment, but if the technical questions are not right, monetary policy will not work.

It is a technically wrong proposition to say that monetary and fiscal policy must be exercised by the same authority. Indeed, it is demonstrably untrue, because there are many examples around the world of different parts of the institutions of a nation state operating fiscal and monetary policy.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister protests too much. Nobody—certainly no Opposition Member—has ever said that the whole of fiscal policy is to be put in the hands of the monetary authorities, or of the bank. The point is that fiscal policy will be partly controlled by the Commission and the Council of Ministers. Fiscal policy on public expenditure, in terms of the ceilings, will be shared with—or partly controlled by, or whatever language one wishes to use—the Commission and ultimately the Council of Ministers. So there is also a transfer of fiscal policy—or of control over some of it—to Community institutions.

Mr. Dorrell: I said in terms that I acknowledged that there was an inhibition on the freedom of manoeuvre of independent nation states, arising from the budget deficit criteria. But the right hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that nobody has suggested during the debate that the consequence of moving to a single currency would be that fiscal policy would become the responsibility of the central bankers. That is exactly the proposition that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield argued at some length—and he is wrong.

It follows from what I have been saying——

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I want to make a bit more progress now.

It follows from what I have said that it is proposed that the monetary authority be separate from the fiscal authority. We in this country are not familiar with that proposition. We know that our institutions have for some time operated on the premise that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is responsible to the House, at this Dispatch Box, for the conduct of both fiscal and monetary policy. If we are designing institutions which could work, and which open for us the choice of a single currency circulating at a later date, we must recognise that that choice is no longer open to us.

If we are designing new institutions which would work and which would allow us to have that choice—a single currency operating within 12 member states—it would be sensible for us to learn from the experience of countries elsewhere in the world which operate fiscal and monetary policy through different institutional arrangements. That is why I make no apology to the Committee for the fact that the European system of central banks looks remarkably like an institution with which many hon. Members are familiar—the Bundesbank. It is no surprise that the ESCB looks like the Bundesbank: there has been a conscious attempt to learn from the experience of a Community member state which has different authorities for fiscal and monetary policy and which, if we examine its record dispassionately, we see has been relatively successful in the conduct of its economic policy.

That is why, under the arrangements for the ESCB set out in the treaty, the executive board and the governing council and its responsibility to the individual national central banks are reminiscent of the arrangements within the Bundesbank. It is also why article 107, about which there has been substantial debate, is reminiscent of the conditions surrounding the operation of the Bundesbank.

Mr. Gill: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I want to make a couple of points about article 107, but first I will give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Gill: If my hon. Friend thinks that the Bundesbank is such a shining example to us all, will he tell us why we have not emulated that example before? Secondly, may I remind him of the question that I asked earlier about the irony of the fact that the Government do not support an independent Bank of England, yet are prepared to support an independent central bank?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend's first question is put to us regularly. We make it clear that within our own national arrangements the important issue is to tackle the substance of the management of monetary policy, not the institutional arrangements. In the end, it does not matter whether responsibility rests with the Chancellor or with a governing council institution within the Bank of England. The important issue on monetary policy is the conduct of that policy. I am asking the Committee to consider how, if we wanted to follow up the choice that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister negotiated for us at Maastricht, we would envisage a single currency being managed within the European Community. Present arrangements for the management of monetary policy in this country, as in every other member state of the Community, would necessarily have to be changed if we were to adopt that approach.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: If we are even to give ourselves the option to move towards signing up for European monetary union—and allowing for the fact that the Government have kept their options open—would it not be logical and sensible to move now towards establishing an independent Bank of England so as to make the final transition that much easier and our understanding of how the arrangements work that much better?

Mr. Dorrell: I do not accept that. Unless and until we decide that we want to move to a single currency, our energies would be better absorbed using our existing institutions, which work perfectly well at a national level, to conduct monetary policy in order to deliver our substantial policy objectives.

Mr. Andrew Smith: If I heard the Minister right, he said that whether monetary policy was under the control of the Treasury or the central council of the Bank was a matter of indifference, and that the important thing was the conduct of that policy. If that is a matter of such indifference, and if the Government are to honour their implicit obligations in article 109j(1)—from which the United Kingdom is not exempt under the opt-out and under which the compatibility of the statutes of our central bank with the provisions of the treaty is to be assessed—are they not under an obligation to introduce legislation to change the Bank's statutes? And when will they decide whether to do that?

Mr. Dorrell: Neither we nor any other member state are under any obligation to change our domestic monetary arrangements, except in the context of a move to stage 3. If we do not intend to move to stage 3—or until we decide that we intend to move to stage 3—I am not in favour of changing the arrangements that we have, which work perfectly well. The burden of proof is on those who argue that institutions need to be changed. I do not think that the case for change in our institutional arrangements is made.

One or two of the points made about article 107 are not borne out by the provision itself. It is important to stress that, although it is certainly true that the European central bank and the national central banks are prevented from taking instructions from Community institutions or bodies, from any Government of a member state or from any other body—in other words, they are accountable for their own decisions and cannot take instructions from an outside body—it is not true that the second half of the article prevents the House, or newspaper journalists, or any other interested parties, from expressing their view about the conduct of monetary policy by the European central bank.

The second half of the question addresses only Community institutions and bodies and Governments of the member states. Those two groups forswear the opportunity to influence members of the board of the European central bank, but they are a relatively narrow group of people; anyone else is free, under the provisions of article 107, to express views about the conduct of monetary policy by the European central bank. That includes this House. [Interruption.] I shall deal with the question of the proper accountability arrangements of the bank in a moment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister is reducing this House to the level of The Sun or Scallywag in saying that it has the right to give its opinion—big deal.

Mr. Dorrell: I am merely pointing out that those who have argued that article 107 prevents hon. Members expressing their view on the conduct of monetary policy by the European central bank are wrong. The article does not do that.

12.15 am

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney argued that the provisions for the independence of the central bank were a major departure from anything seen before. They are very similar indeed to the arrangements for the independence of the members of the Commission which were introduced by the treaty of Rome, which says:

"Members of the Commission, in the performance of these duties, shall neither seek nor take instructions from any Government or any other body" and it provides that

"Member States undertake to respect this principle and not to seek to influence Members of the Commission in the performance of their tasks."

So it is not true to say that the independence provisions of the treaty of Maastricht are a significant departure.

Mr. Shore: There is a real difference between one eight-year term not to be renewed and five-year terms for Commissioners, who are eligible for renewal and who hope to be renewed.

Mr. Dorrell: There is a difference, though I am not sure that I would accept the description of it as a big one. I do not deny that the central bank is set up to be independent and that the provisions are designed to ensure its independence, and I shall discuss how accountability is to be delivered in the context of those independence provisions.

Mr. Marlow: In relation to article 107, my hon. Friend said that the House could express its view and opinion. If there is a debate here and he is standing at the Dispatch Box putting the Government's point of view, how will he be able to respond to the debate? What views will he be able to put to the House? How will he be able to take account of the views of hon. Members? What will he be able to say? The answer is nothing. Article 107 says that he cannot say anything.

Mr. Dorrell: It is flattering to hear my hon. Friend ascribe such importance to the views expressed from this Dispatch Box. I hope that he will feel persuaded to follow the weight of my argument tonight, as he implies he would at a later date in relation to questions about monetary policy.

The arrangements for the accountability of the central bank are set out in two places in the treaty. One is in article 109b, which provides arrangements very similar to those which prevail within the Bundesbank—that members of the Council can attend and argue their case but cannot vote within the governing council of the bank, that the bank in turn will be invited to participate in Council meetings and that the central bank will produce

"an annual report on the activities of the ESCB and on the monetary policy of both the previous and current year to the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission, and also to the European Council."

That refers to the Heads of State and Government meeting on a six-monthly basis. It goes on:

"The President of the ESCB shall present this report to the Council and to the European Parliament".

Those are the institutional arrangements for reporting set out in that article of the treaty.

In addition, and of some significance in view of recent events in this country, are the arrangements set out on page 94 in article 15 of the ESCB protocol. That article sets out extensive requirements for the ESCB to publish reports on its activities. It requires:

"A consolidated financial statement of the ESCB shall be published each week" and it states that it must draw up and publish reports on its activities quarterly, with an annual report being made in the way I described. That is of some significance, particularly in view of the arrangements that the Chancellor has set up for the conduct of monetary policy in this country. He has placed great stress on the importance of providing information to those who operate in the market, or comment on the market in the newspapers, and people who are interested in such affairs so that they can see on a regular basis the information against which money policy decisions are made. The same arrangements are provided in this treaty in the context of the European central bank.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The Minister would show more conviction if he openly admitted that this House will lose a range of powers in the future. Some of us think that it is a cracking good idea. Does he accept that in the future, the influence of this House on aspects of monetary policy and the central bank will be roughly equivalent to, say, that which the Scottish Grand Committee has on fiscal policy in Scotland at present?

Mr. Dorrell: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I started my speech, but I made it clear that if there is a single currency which circulates in 12 member states of the Community it follows, as night follows day, that the existing monetary arrangements within the member states would lose some of the power that they have at present. That is the choice that the House will be asked to make when it decides to join a single currency. It is not being asked to make that choice now.

Mr. Andrew Smith: When I asked the Minister a question relating to article 109j(1), he said that there was no obligation for the United Kingdom to move towards the independence of the central bank until the third stage. I draw his attention to article 109e(5), which clearly states:

"During the second stage, each Member State shall, as appropriate, start the process leading to the independence of its central bank".

When will the Government take a decision on that?

Mr. Dorrell: I did not say that we had no obligation to introduce an independent central bank until we had moved to a single currency. I said that we were not obliged to do so unless and until we decided that we wished to move to a single currency. That is the position.

Mr. Hain: If amendment No. 36 were put to the vote and carried, would that prevent the Government from ratifying the treaty, in the light of the Attorney-General's guidance on amendment No. 27? As amendment No. 27 related to opting out of the social chapter, so the British Government have opted out of stage 3 of monetary union, which this debate and the amendment specifically address.

Mr. Dorrell: I made it clear that we have introduced a Bill which gives effect to all the provisions necessary to the exercise of either discretion on the question of a single currency. The Bill makes provision which will work if the United Kingdom chooses to adopt the single currency or if it chooses not to adopt the single currency.

The arrangements that I have described have been referred to by more than one hon. Member in the debate as a bankers' Europe, making provision for the conduct of monetary policy to be unaccountable and conducted by central bankers in a way which is contrary to the interests of working people throughout the Community. Today and in an earlier debate on this subject, my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey asked why, even if we have a single currency——

Mr. Hain: On a point of order, Dame Janet. I regret having to raise a point of order, but I ask for your guidance on this point. I asked the Minister a specific question about legal advice from the Attorney-General on amendment No. 36. During previous debates in Committee on this Bill, we were promised that advice, but that point has not been answered. Could you give some guidance as to whether that point should be answered because we might be required to vote on it shortly?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Such matters of substance are not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Dorrell: In conclusion, I return to the basic point. This evening, the Committee is not being asked to give the green light to a single currency. The decisions that the Committee is making in the context of this Bill have no consequences for the independence of the Bank of England, for parliamentary control of our existing monetary policy arrangements or, as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield argued, for the Conservative tradition of a strong and free United Kingdom or, indeed, the Labour party tradition, which he identified as standing against the interests of capital.

The day may come when the House is asked to decide to adopt a single currency, with the institutional arrangements that I have described, but we are not at that day now. If we decided to go to stage 3 we would have to consider the issue of an independent central bank under the arrangements that I have described. We would also have to establish to our satisfaction our own procedures for making those arrangements accountable.

Today's isssue is much simpler. Is this a sensible arrangement for the management of a single currency, if we chose to adopt one? I believe that is, and on that basis I do not want to see amendments incorporated into the Bill which would make those arrangements unworkable.

Mr. Hain: The debates on this and the next two groupings of amendments deal with the guts of the treaty —its economic framework. The reason why I am so critical of the treaty is that the economic framework, specifically in terms of establishing an unaccountable central bank, is bad for our economy and society.

When one examines the origins of the proposal to establish a central bank, one finds that it was framed during the high tide of monetarism in the 1980s, when European policy makers hatched the idea of the independent European central bank. The hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) took us back to an earlier genesis of the idea in the late 1930s. I shall not follow him in that.

When the proposal for a European central bank was hatched, the political situation was entirely different. The intellectual fashion was for monetarist ideas. The independent central bank was an example of that. It will be the driving force behind Maastricht. It will drive Europe uncompromisingly towards monetary union and enforce price and interest rate stability, virtually regardless of the consequences for employment, redistribution and public welfare, all of which would be entirely secondary matters for the all-powerful bank.

We have seen that that monetarist vision is deeply flawed. It has been rejected in America and I am sure that it will soon be rejected here in Britain. It should be rejected in Europe, too. In that sense, the economic framework of the Maastricht treaty is severely out of date. It was out of date even before the ink had dried on it.

Massive changes have occurred since the original economic programme for Maastricht was framed. For example, we have seen the reunification of Germany and massive deflation has been imposed across Europe. Unemployment is rising continuously. It now stands at some 18 million to 19 million across the European Community. If present trends continue, according to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, that total will reach 30 million, with all the awful prospects that that holds for us. In addition, the ERM has imploded. All those factors have created an entirely new situation which should have been recognised. It requires a renegotiation of the treaty's economic framework, especially the establishment of an independent central bank.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech closely and I find myself in considerable agreement with it. He has just come on to the establishment of an independent European central bank. Bearing in mind the control that that bank will have and the criteria on which it will operate, will not it produce massive unemployment throughout the European Community? In the absence of any accountability, will not it create social unrest which most of Europe, and certainly the United Kingdom, has seldom, if ever, experienced?

Mr. Hain: Indeed. I was about to deal with that point. The bank to which the hon. Gentleman refers was due to be established as part of the final stage 3 transition to monetary union and a single currency. That is why I raised the question that the Minister failed to answer on amendment No. 36. I take his failure to answer directly as confirmation of the fact that if amendment No. 36 were carried the ratification of the treaty would not be affected. We have to assume that because the Minister has not denied it.

Under article 3a the primary objective is "to maintain price stability and, without prejudice to this objective, to support the general economic policies in the Community, in accordance with the principle of an open market economy with free competition.

These activities of the Member States and the Community shall entail compliance with the following guiding principles: stable prices, sound public finances and monetary conditions and a sustainable balance of payments."

There is absolutely no mention of full employment policies.

12.30 am

Nobody has disputed the fact that this is the most important article in the treaty. It is far more important than article 2 to which some of my hon. Friends constantly refer and which I call the apple pie and motherhood article. It is full of nice, generous phrases, but is virtually meaningless when measured up to the specific targets and policies which are carefully prescribed in subsequent articles and specified exactly in article 3a.

Mr. Mandelson: Why are the parts of the treaty that my hon. Friend likes and is fond of quoting so much more meaningful than the articles to which his hon. Friends refer? Why are high employment, high living standards and growth, so hollow and meaningless whereas what he likes is so full of meaning and portent for the future of Europe? I do not understand it.

Mr. Hain: Let me explain to the hon. Gentleman why he should understand it and ask him to restrain the sharpness of his tongue. If he reads the article and compares the specific references in article 3a to price stability and so forth to the rather general phrases in article 2, he will see that the latter are apple pie and motherhood phrases about full employment and welfare, to which we can all subscribe but which are specifically denied by article 3 and all the subsequent articles that I am about to quote to him.

Mr. Rowlands: Will my hon. Friend draw attention to the primary objectives in article 5 on the ESCB? While article 2 is article 3 requires compliance. The language is totally different. One involves compliance while the other is a general objective.

"with a view to contributing to the achievement",

Mr. Hain: Indeed. My hon. Friend makes a convincing point. It is the central flaw in the views of those who are turning a blind eye to the real content of the treaty, as the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) is inviting us to do. He wants us to salute the general phrases and the nice, rolling words of the treaty, but he wishes us to ignore the specifics which ultimately require legal compliance, despite their hugely deflationary consequences. I consider that irresponsible because it will have enormous consequences not only for my constituents in an outlying region of Britain, but for his constituents who also live in an outlying region, especially in relation to the hub of the European Community where all decisions will be made and where power will be centralised.

Mr. Mandelson: Talking about sharpness, I do not need to take any lectures from hon. Friends about the effectiveness with which I represent my constituents.

May I just ask my hon. Friend two things? Why is it that article 2, the first substantial article of the entire treaty, which starts with the words

"The Community shall have as its task"—

I will not read the rest of it because it is familiar—is so meaningless? Secondly, why—after all, my hon. Friend raised article 3a—does not he subscribe to this categorical and clear statement which I should have thought would enjoy the support of all Opposition Members:

"the adoption of an economic policy which is based on the close co-ordination of Member States' economic policies, on the internal market and on the definition of common objectives"?

What is so commonly objectionable about that? I should have thought that it echoed precisely Labour party statements and our manifesto at the last general election.

Mr. Hain: There is nothing commonly objectionable about it at all. No hon. Member could object to those fine and rolling words.

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend is choosing to ignore them.

Mr. Hain: No, I am not choosing to ignore them at all. What I am pointing out to the hon. Member and to other hon. Members, if they care to listen, is that one can start off a treaty with all sorts of fine words, but when it comes to the implementation of that treaty——

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend is ducking and weaving.

Mr. Hain: No, it is not a question of ducking and weaving and picking and choosing——[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. We cannot have a sub-conversation going on. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) has had a number of opportunities to intervene. When he is not intervening, he must keep quiet.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful, Dame Janet. Could I just emphasise that it is not a question of picking and choosing or ducking and weaving but of looking objectively at the treaty and at those instruments, one of which is specified in article 3a, the principal one of price stability, an objective which nothing must compromise. One then has to measure up those specific instruments against the woolliness of the earlier phrases and the fine words that we can all salute and subscribe to.

Mr. Leighton: In relation to what my hon. Friend has called the apple pie and motherhood clause, with these woolly words, is it not a fact that similar words also occur in the treaty of Rome? But what has been the result of that? Why is it, if we have such nice words in the treaty, that we have 18 million to 19 million workers unemployed? Is not it true that, despite having those nice words in the treaty of Rome, the Community has become the unemployment black spot of the world, and that this would make it worse?

Mr. Hain: Without going into the treaty of Rome, I think that my hon. Friend's point about the European Community becoming the unemployment blackspot of the world is valid. The average unemployment rate in the EC has now outstripped that in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, whereas it used to be below it. One must ask why. The answer is clear. What we have had in the past few years is a dress rehearsal for precisely the kind of deflationary, monetarist policies which Maastricht celebrates and institutionalises and which will cause mass unemployment and further deflation across Europe.

Sir Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Hain: I would like to make progress, if the hon. Member does not mind, but I shall be happy to give way later.

Under this treaty the European central bank will be an independent institution. It will be required, as article 3a specifies, to be single-mindedly dedicated to low inflation, virtually regardless of the consequences for employment and social equality. That is the key point. It is specified that national central banks will be subordinated to the unaccountable European central bank and not to their elected Governments—a point which has recurred in contributions to this debate. It will be specifically prevented from being accountable to the elected national Governments. If the timetable is strictly adhered to, the Bank of England would have to be privatised, or at least made fully independent, by 1999, as is already happening in France and has just been completed in Spain.

The independence of the European central bank is uncompromisingly spelled out in chapter 2, article 107—another one that I want to quote for the record:

"When exercising the powers and carrying out the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty and the Statute of the ESCB, neither the ESCB, nor a national central bank, nor any member of their decision-making bodies shall seek or take instructions from Community institutions or bodies, from any government of a Member State or from any other body.

The Community institutions and bodies and the governments of the Member States undertake to respect this principle and not to seek to influence the members of the decision-making bodies of the ECB or of the national central banks in the performance of their tasks."

There is not much fudging, or ducking and weaving there—it is crystal clear. Elected Governments and politicians are barred from influencing the governing body of the European central bank, which is equally obliged to disregard any representations made to them.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I fully agree with that excellent argument. Will the hon. Member remind his very gullible and talkative friend, the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), that many political parties have promoted policies comprising full employment, high wages and lots of sunshine, but those are extremely difficult to achieve if the basic policies inherent in the manifestos are a load of rubbish and if they are deliberately designed to create unemployment and misery?

Mr. Hain: I shall allow the hon. Member for Hartlepool to make his own case in his own way.

Not only does the treaty require——

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The Committee proceeded to a Division, and the Second Deputy Chairman having directed that the Doors be locked——

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Dame Janet. You will notice that the Door to one of the Lobbies has been locked whereas the Door to the other one has been left open. We have seen some funny tricks in the Committee, but this is one of the oddest.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that it was my fault. I ordered the Doors to be locked in error. I apologise for the mistake. I am sure that the Doorkeepers will open the Doors to allow us to proceed as usual.

Whereupon the Doors were unlocked.

The Committee having divided: Ayes 236, Noes 70.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Sydney Chapman and
Mr. Timothy Wood.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can you help the House by confirming the rules of order? I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) had been making his speech for about 10 minutes when the closure was moved. Is it the custom of the House for hon. Members, for reasons of courtesy, to wait until the end of a speech before moving the closure, or have you discretion to accept it immediately if you think that sufficient debate has taken place on a matter of this importance?

The Second Deputy Chairman: It is perfectly within the rules for the closure to be moved in the middle of a speech —and, in fact, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) had spoken for 15 minutes.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Dame Janet. Would it be in order for documents relevant to the debate to be laid on the Table? It is the custom and practice of Parliament for relevant documents to be made available to hon. Members. I have in mind the document that sets out the deal between the Government and the Liberals, under which the Liberals voted with the Government so that they can get away on Friday to go to a conference at Dunoon or somewhere similar.

The Second Deputy Chairman: If such an agreement exists, it certainly does not have the status of a state paper.

Mr. Winnick: The matters that are due to be debated, some of which have already been debated, are of great political and economic significance. Is it the case that you, Dame Janet, have complete discretion over whether to accept the closure motion? In view of the rumour, which is presumably correct, that the Government intend to debate amendments and new clauses until 1 pm on Thursday, what will be the position of the Chair with regard to closure motions moved by the Government? Surely there should be plenty of time to discuss these issues. The Government should not take the opportunity to run through them all in one night which, judging by the 10 o'clock business motion which they won with the Liberals' support, they intend to do. I hope that those points will be duly taken into account by the Chair.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I do not offer hostages to fortune by speculating on what might or might not be. I deal with situations as they arise.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On a point of order, Dame Janet. I had tabled eight amendments in the previous group but was not called to speak. That group covered a major issue —the future of the central bank—and was decided in a brief six and a half hours. If, as you said, you have the discretion to turn down a closure motion, may I ask how you are able to consider the matter in the middle of an hon. Member's speech?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I make my own decisions on that and I am confident that I made the correct decision. The role of the Chair is simply to ensure that there is no gross abuse of the rights of the minority. After that, it is for the Committee to decide whether to curtail debate.

Mr. Wilkinson: Further to that point of order, Dame Janet. I would not for a moment question your ruling, which is wholly within the letter of the rules of procedure, but is it in the spirit of this place, which works effectively by agreement, understanding and tolerance, for the Government to move closure motions in the middle of speeches?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have already explained that it is perfectly within the rules and I do not think that I can make any further observations.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Dame Janet. You may have noticed that, during the past few years, debates have taken place in other parts of the country, for example, in Scotland and Wales. I wonder whether you are prepared to have a word with Madam Speaker about having a series of Maastricht debates in Newbury in the run-up to the by-election? Labour Members could explain about the conspiracy between the Tory and Liberal parties, tell the Newbury electorate that they are both in one bag and give the people there a chance to vote for members of the Labour party who will vote against Maastricht.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that that goes well beyond my duties in the Chair.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Dame Janet. You quite properly said that the Chair's responsibility was, among other things, to protect the minorities. As I happen to be the only Scottish Conservative Member who stood at the general election on a platform of opposing the Maastricht treaty, would I be correct in assuming, Dame Janet, that I belong to that rare breed of minorities that are to be taken into consideration? If so, may I remind you that I was trying to speak in the debate?

The Second Deputy Chairman: It may not always be possible to call all hon. Members who wish to speak, but I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that he has had a reasonable share. We must now turn to the next——

Mr. Winnick: Will you, Dame Janet, accept a motion to report progress?

The Second Deputy Chairman: No, I will not. We now come to the next group of amendments, under the heading "Economic policy and deficits".

1.15 am

Mr. Peter Shore: I beg to move amendment No. 79, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'(with the exception of those Articles and Protocols set out in Schedule [Excessive Deficits])'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient also to discuss the following: Amendment No. 98, in clause 1, page 1, line 9 after 'II', insert

'but not Article 103 in Title II thereof'.

Amendment No. 48, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert

'but not Article 104c in Title II thereof'.

Amendment No. 61, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert

'but not the Protocol on the Excessive Deficit Procedure.'.

Amendment No. 203, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert

'but not Article 103a in Title VI of Title II thereof'.

Amendment No. 114, in page 1, line 17, at end add—

'The above subsections shall only come into force subsequent to the laying before Parliament of a Command Paper concerning the implications for the United Kingdom of Articles 102a and 103 and related Articles of the Treaty on European Union, with particular reference to the decision-making structure in respect of economic convergence and allocation of resources and to approval of its terms by Resolution of both Houses of Parliament.'.

New clause 2—Information from Commission—

'In implementing the provisions of Article 103(3) of Title II of the Treaty on European Union, information shall be submitted to the Commission from the United Kingdom indicating performance on economic growth, industrial investment, employment and balance of trade, together with comparisons with those items of performance from other member states.'.

New clause 57—Convergence criteria: assessment of deficits—

'Before submitting the information required in implementing Article 103(3) of Title II of the Treaty on European Union, Her Majesty's Government shall report to Parliament for its approval an assessment of the medium term economic and budgetary position in relation to the social, economic and environmental goals set out in Title II, Article 2, which report shall form the basis of any submission of information to the Commission which may be required under Articles 103(3) and 104(c) of the Treaty.'.

Amendment No. 80, new schedule:—

'EXCESSIVE DEFICITS

(1) Article 104c.

(2) Protocol on Excessive Deficits.'.

Mr. Shore: The amendment seeks to exclude article 104c and its related protocol. I am sure that the Committee will be delighted to know that this is not a probing amendment. It is a serious and substantive amendment, and we shall vote on it when the time comes. That means that we have come to the end of a period of what I call cosy collusion and shadow boxing among the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen, the Ministers and the Liberal Democrats, all of whom are in favour of the treaty and have been conducting a spurious debate on the issue. At least we shall try, now that we have the opportunity, to put the serious arguments before the Committee, because I believe that the Committee should consider them.

As the Committee will be aware, the public sector borrowing requirement has always been one of the crucial instruments of economic policy. I have always thought of the size of the Government's borrowing requirement as the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget judgment, to be made each year in the light of the circumstances that pertain. Under the treaty, and especially under article 104c, that judgment is no longer to be taken by any future Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom. Instead, the Budget judgment is to be made by the Maastricht treaty.

Article 104c begins with the imperative instruction:

"Member States shall avoid excessive government deficits."

The associated protocol than lays down what it calls the "reference values", according to which an excessive Government deficit is to be judged. I am sure that the Committee will be familiar by now with the two reference values—3 per cent. of GDP for the public sector borrowing requirement, and 60 per cent. of GDP as the reference value, or limit, for the national debt.

It is true that words are added to article 104c that give a certain qualification to the starkness of the 3 per cent. and 60 per cent. specified in the protocol. Extremely carefully chosen words allow some slight movement from those precise values. Article 104c(2) says:

"The Commission shall monitor the development of the budgetary situation and of the stock of government debt in the Member States with a view to identifying gross errors. In particular it shall examine compliance with budgetary discipline on the basis of the following two criteria"— this is where the slight softening of the harsh terms of 3 per cent. and 60 per cent. comes in—

"whether the ratio of the planned or actual government deficit to gross domestic product exceeds a reference value, unless . . . the ratio has declined substantially and reached a level that comes close to the reference value"—

I emphasise the word "close"; in the case of the PSBR, that means close to 3 per cent.—

"or, alternatively, the excess over the reference value is only exceptional and temporary and the ratio remains close to the reference value."

That is most important, as I shall show later, in relation to this country's experience. It is easy to imagine the effects of those limitations.

Mr. Winnick: We have been hearing from hon. Members, including some Labour Members, that the treaty favours opportunities for employment and so on. It is true that article 2 contains a passing reference to employment, but article 104c contains two full columns giving all the reasons why Governments should avoid deficits. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will be mentioning the fact that the article goes on to refer to the penalties and fines that could be imposed if Governments exceeded the 3 per cent. Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is all the difference between a passing reference to employment and social policy, of which we would all approve, and the emphasis in article 104c on the deficit and on what could happen to member states that exceed the limit?

Mr. Shore: I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall be saying something about the penalties and coercive powers that are allowed under the provisions, which I find profoundly disturbing.

Article 104c(3) contains a slight concession in respect of the strictness of the 3 per cent. and 6 per cent. limits. As I have said, the Commission is the great disciplining force. It will monitor and identify gross errors. Article 104c(3) states:

"If a Member State does not fulfil the requirements under one or both of these criteria, the Commission shall prepare a report."

Here comes the slight concession:

"The report of the Commission shall also take into account whether the government deficit exceeds government investment expenditure and take into account all other relevant factors, including the medium term economic and budgetary position of the Member State."

Dr. Godman: My right hon. Friend talks about the Commission being the disciplining force. Is he entirely correct? It appears that, under article 104c, the Commission will perform the role of policeman but that —astonishingly, to my mind—the Council will perform the role of a court. Paragraph 11 says that the Council can "impose fines of an appropriate size."

Will the Council in turn refer a recalcitrant member to the European Court of Justice, or does the Council have the power to impose fines on member states?

Mr. Shore: I shall discuss that a little later in my speech. My hon. Friend is correct in what he said at the beginning. The Commission basically has a policing role, and it is the Council of Ministers that makes the decision.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Can the right hon. Gentleman imagine this scenario? Suppose that the United Kingdom has ratified Maastricht and is part of the structure, and our membership, at some time in the future, of the ERM, has produced a situation similar to that which has prevailed for the past 18 months—that is, it has lost this country thousands of businesses and a million jobs. A million jobs cost this country £8 billion, which contributes to our deficit. Because of our membership of a Community institution and a Community system, we would be in deficit beyond the 3 per cent., and because of that, we would be further fined. That could happen. Is that a situation that the right hon. Gentleman relishes or believes that the people of this country would relish?

Mr. Shore: It is outrageous, and I shall develop my reasons for saying so. The whole notion of an alien body imposing fines and penalties on a sovereign nation is entirely unacceptable.

I was referring to the policeman role of the Commission, which will monitor, identify gross errors and draw up a report. The provision says that it will take account of whether a Government's deficit exceeds Government investment expenditure, as though that were somehow less a matter for condemnation than if it was simply a current account deficit.

We have not been told what weight the Commission will give to such matters, but we should not be over-cheered when we consider Government investment expenditure in this country as a percentage of GDP, because it accounts for a small part of the total. Indeed, in the Red Book published this year, we got a picture of general Government investment. It showed that between £11 billion and £12·5 billion—about 2 per cent. of GDP—is the total of Government investment. I ask the Committee to bear those details in mind as I describe the relevance of the figures.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman, in view of his knowledge, explain to what the gross errors relate? Are they errors of judgment or arithmetical errors? Having read the provision many times, I still do not have a clue what it means by gross errors. Does he believe, as I do, that somebody will consider whether an error of judgment has been made? If so, that will be a major step beyond an arithmetical error.

Mr. Shore: I think it refers back to the figures of 3 per cent. and 60 per cent., allowing a margin or tolerance, as I described it. It refers to gross errors, and those errors will be the distance of a country's performance from its targets. The Commission will prepare a report if it believes there is a risk of an excessive deficit. It is empowered, having consulted the monetary committee, to address an opinion to the Council. The Council, acting by a qualified majority, will decide whether an excessive deficit has arisen.

We can conclude that there is an imprecise margin, a tolerance, in the reference values of 3 per cent. and 60 per cent. How helpful is that margin likely to be? To answer that, I must refer the Committee to certain statistics. The first is this year's PSBR. The projected PSBR figures for 1992-93 to 1997-98 are set out in the medium-term financial strategy in Red Book. For 1992-93, the PSBR was 5·75 per cent. For 1993-94, the year on which the Budget has concentrated, it is 8 per cent. of GDP. In 1994-95, it is 6·5 per cent., 1995-96, 5·5 per cent. and 1996-97, 4·5 per cent.

The figure comes close to the presumption in the present forecast only in 1997-98 when it is under 4 per cent.—3·75 per cent.—for the first time. If we had to get within the 3 per cent. level over that whole period, what would be the effects on the British economy, the level of employment and funding of public services?

Sir Teddy Taylor: They would shove up taxes.

1.30 am

Mr. Shore: It is unbelievable to think what would happen. Six billion pounds is equivalent to 1 per cent. of GDP. When we have a public sector borrowing requirement deficit which has been forecast at 8 per cent. of gross domestic product, we are talking about £30 billion in either reduced expenditure or increased taxation to get from 8 to 3 per cent. A lesser amount—although it would still be a high figure—would be demanded in each year of the five-year forecast of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does the right hon. Gentleman find it extraordinary that, far from the Council communicating to the national parliament of a country which is straying outside the guideline reference of percentage gross national product on budget deficit, paragraph 11 merely suggests that the President of the Council shall inform the European Parliament of a decision taken? In our earlier debate, the Financial Secretary said that the member state will continue to have independent fiscal powers. That does not seem to accord with paragraph 11, which says that the European Parliament is the body which must be told about a defaulting country.

Mr. Shore: That is absolutely right. It is a different form of coercion from that which we were talking about with regard to the central bank and its powers. Collective decisions will be made by qualified majority voting in the Council. The Commission will make its recommendation and report, and the Council will act on it by qualified majority voting. That will be a major imposition on the United Kingdom. We might have a report or we might demand a debate on it, but we will have no power to influence it.

Mr. Winnick: As far as Britain and the House of Commons are concerned, do we not lose both ways under article 104c? A right-wing Tory Government who were determined to cut public spending—they need no such encouragement—would undoubtedly say, "We have no alternative under the terms of the treaty." Likewise, a Labour Government—hopefully carrying out policies which we would like to see—would say, "We would like to do otherwise. It goes against the grain; nevertheless, we are part and parcel of the arrangements. We have no alternative because, if we go over the limit as far as the deficit is concerned, and if we do the public spending and so on which the Labour movement is so keen about, we will be penalised." At the end of the day, power is completely taken away from this Chamber.

Mr. Shore: I am coming to a point which will help my hon. Friend's case. It is true that the Labour party has always had a special commitment to public expenditure and public services. We plead guilty. Therefore, to have such limitations imposed on a Labour Government is totally unacceptable.

I do not wish to split the Committee unnecessarily. Many people on the other side of politics also understand the value of public services and public expenditure and do not want to see the devastation and ever-increasing unemployment that would result from the restriction on borrowing. So the matter should not necessarily divide us, although I say again that there is a special affection for public expenditure in the Labour party.

Mr. Betts: I am sure that no Opposition Member would find the rigid imposition of the 3 per cent. or 60 per cent. reference criteria acceptable, but is it not the case that, in their raw and unrefined form, the criteria in article 104c(2) apply to the production of a report? Once that report is produced, as laid down in paragraph 3, other criteria, including the investment expenditure criteria, all other relevant factors, the medium-term economic and budgetary strategy and the comments of the member states, later come into play. My right hon. Friend referred to Government forecasts of debt as a percentage of GDP for the next few years. They include a large element of the non-cyclical part of investment expenditure, which would be taken into account under paragraph 3.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend is trying to comfort himself. I understand well why he does so—because the article is so unacceptable. He is trying to say that it does not mean what it says, and that 3 per cent. is not the real figure. I carefully went over the ground saying where the tolerances were. The figures were approximations which would only exceptionally be departed from. I also took special account of the distinction made between investment expenditure and other expenditure. As the total investment expenditure is only 2 per cent., if it is all taken into account and set against the target, anything over 3 per cent. plus 2 per cent. would be ruled out.

Next year, the Government PSBR is 8 per cent. of GDP. In no way can my hon. Friend comfort himself by saying that the matter has been dealt with and that reports have to be produced and a judgment made. Of course that is so. Of course people have to consider it. But at the end of the day, the treaty defines excess deficit. I am not even certain whether action could not be taken before the European Court of Justice in the fulfilment of those treaty terms.

Mr. Skinner: My right hon Friend will appreciate that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) would have been in one hell of a mess as the leader of Sheffield city council if the same restrictions had been placed on borrowing. Within our parliamentary set-up, he was able to extricate the city council from its problems to a degree. If Sheffield was transposed to the nation state arena inside the Common Market, he would have had supreme difficulties.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) remembers 1976. He remembers Mr. Witteveen. I remember the fight that my right hon. Friend put up for an alternative policy to the restrictions. Does he agree that, even though the Labour Government took the wrong turn on that occasion—history has shown it to be wrong, and my right hon. Friend was right in the battle that he took part in—we were able to resolve that problem in a limited fashion within the nation state? Yet inside the Common Market, Mr. Witteveen would have reigned supreme not merely for a few months or years: we would have been in his stranglehold for ever.

Mr. Shore: Absolutely right. That is the central difference. All Governments who are obliged to call in the International Monetary Fund have to come to some agreement with it. But a sporadic visit is a different thing from the permanent requirements of the treaty. It would be as though a European Commissioner sat at the Cabinet table all the time invigilating and watching whether the Government were about to transgress or had transgressed their reference values.

Mr. Cash: The so-called opt-in which has been negotiated on behalf of the United Kingdom, relating to the central bank and the deficit arrangement, excludes during the transitional period article 104c(1) and other provisions, including the requirement not to have excessive Government deficits. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, although the opt-in or opt-out that has been so acclaimed is no more than a fig leaf, as Robin Oakley of the BBC made clear he had understood from everyone he came across in Whitehall and the European Community, there is another protocol, which says that all these arrangements are irreversible and irrevocable and must come into effect on 1 January 1999, come what may, and which tells the truth about what is going on. Just in case the Minister——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. This is an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. Cash: In case the Minister is tempted to say that all the provisions are left out under the protocol, I simply want to point out that the protocol is a worthless piece of paper, and that a future Parliament will not be in a position to make a decision. The decision is being taken now. The Minister may be shaking his head, but that is the position.

Mr. Shore: I shall certainly await with interest what the Minister has to say.

One of the difficulties of tonight's debate is that there are three closely related economic debates on which more amendments have been tabled than for the rest of the treaty. Unfortunately, those three immensely important interrelated debates will be pushed through in a single unbroken session. We have not had the opportunity of studying in Hansard what the Minister has said in response to the first debate before being launched into the second, and it looks as though the Government will try to press us into the third debate.

The point raised by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) cannot sensibly be answered until we have studied the Minister's replies to the first two debates. We shall not have that opportunity. It is a terrible misuse of the House of Commons on matters that everyone will agree, whether or not they are in favour of the treaty, are at the heart of it—economic and monetary union and the transfer of powers from Britain to European institutions.

Dr. Godman: May I ask my right hon. Friend a question about the monetary committee? In passing, I offer my compliments to my right hon. Friend and the 20 or 30 other hon. Members who, in the absence of a referendum, are performing a fine service for the people of the United Kingdom in scrutinising the treaty so closely. As the Council seems to have the power to impose fines against a recalcitrant state, has that state the right of appeal to the European Court of Justice? Given that there are 26 persons to be appointed to the monetary committee, does that committee's opinion have to be unanimous when it recommends that a state be fined by the Council?

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Dame Janet, before my right hon. Friend replies to that intervention—I apologise to him. I sought earlier to move to report progress and, no doubt on reflection, you decided not to accept my motion. Was your refusal such that you would not consider it at any future stage during the night, or would you be willing to accept a motion, or at least ponder it at some appropriate time?

Some of us believe, arising from what my right hon. Friend said, that it is totally wrong, quite inappropriate, that we should be debating these matters all through the night, and that we should have a further opportunity at some other time to do so.

1.45 pm

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Further to the specific point of order, Dame Janet, raised by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). I believe that I am correct in saying that the Select Committee on Procedure has produced a report, which has not been fully debated or agreed by the House, based upon the Jopling inquiry carried out on behalf of the House, which firmly recommends—senior and distinguished Members were part of the Committee and agreed to the report—that the House should not sit beyond 10 o'clock on Government business.

I put the point particularly to you, Dame Janet, because of the observations just made by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). In these particular groups of amendments that we have considered, are considering and, depending on your ruling, may well be considering a little later, on critical constitutional matters, it is important for those of us who are trying to scrutinise this legislation to have an opportunity to study the ministerial responses.

As a constitutionalist and a man deeply wedded to the rights of the House, I put it to you that we are being deprived of that opportunity. Bearing in mind the report that the Select Committee on Procedure has produced, this is surely an abuse of the Committee by the Government of the day.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The Chair must operate under existing rules, customs and Standing Orders. As the hon. Member will know very well, it is perfectly possible to extend the sittings of the Committee under the present regime. As regards any motion to report progress, whoever is the occupant of the Chair at the time will have to come to that decision. I would certainly not wish to give any opinion in advance.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can you confirm that the rules of order, both for the Committee upstairs and the Committee downstairs, permit the Chair to accept a motion for closure, even when there has been no wind-up or reply from the Government Benches after the introductory speech which they have made, as no doubt they will shortly, in relation to any group of amendments?

The customs and courtesies that I have experienced upstairs have been that there has been a reply from the Government Bench after other speeches have been made and as a sort of wind-up comparable to that at Second Reading. I take it—perhaps you will confirm it—that no Standing Order prohibits your accepting a motion for the closure even when that has not happened?

Can I put it to you, Dame Janet, that it may well be within your discretion—perhaps you could confirm that it is possible—for you to decline to accept that motion for closure if such a reply has not been given in these debates of enormous constitutional significance?

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has discretion, but one looks to the principles behind it, which are clearly stated—that there should be no gross abuse of the rights of minorities in the House. I think that we must make further progress.

Mr. Shore: A ruling on what is a gross abuse or what is a gross excess is among the things that we are discussing tonight.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) intervened just before points of order were raised, and I will try to deal with the question he put. My understanding is that the Council of Ministers, by qualified majority vote and excluding the member state which is, as it were, in the dock, will make the decision.

I do not think that there is an appeal to the European Court of Justice against that, but if a member state refused to comply with the further penalties, the Commission could take that state to the court.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Dame Janet. My questions to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), concerning the power of the Council to impose swingeing fines, and the powers of the monetary committee, raise important legal questions, and, as you know, I am not a lawyer. It would be helpful if the Attorney-General were present during the debate to give us guidance on those important questions. From article 104c, it would appear that the Council will take on some of the functions of an international court. I am not so sure that any hon. Member present can answer the questions that—perhaps unfairly—I asked my right hon. Friend. They are important legal questions, and an English and a Scottish Law Officer should be present.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that the hon. Member has been here long enough to know that it is not for the Chair to compel the attendance of the Attorney-General or any other hon. Member. Representatives of the Government are on the Front Bench, and no doubt they will have heard the hon. Gentleman's point of order.

Mr. Shore: Obviously it would be helpful if the Attorney-General were here to deal with the sort of questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow has raised. I also find it surprising that the Chancellor and shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer have not looked in. I cannot think of any measure which more directly affects the power of a Chancellor than the impositions that will be placed upon him in the exercise of his Budget judgment, under the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Wilkinson: Might not that power be redundant in the future, in as much as it will be transferred to the Commission and the Council of Ministers?

Mr. Shore: Perhaps so, but I cannot believe that that could be welcome to the Chancellor, or his shadow, if they take their responsibilities seriously, as I believe they do. The present Chancellor is already a transgressor of the treaty, as he has gone way beyond the limits of tolerance, which I was trying delicately to outline. He has behaved like Sheffield council at its worst.

[Mr. Shore]

I was seeking to establish that the matter concerns both sides of the House. I have given the figures for the Government's medium-term forecast for the economy. Every year, it has been well in excess of that forecast, except for last year, when it just crept under 4 per cent. It cannot be right that we should subject ourselves to that sort of discipline. It cannot be the Government's judgment that that is right for the country—they have their own economic doctrines and priorities—and it certainly is not the judgment of those on the Labour Front Bench and in the Labour party that it is good for Britain to be forced to make the sort of cuts, or raise the taxes, indicated by the figures.

Mr. Cryer: That issue is of peculiar importance to Labour Members. My right hon. Friend has outlined a scenario in which a Labour Government could be elected, inheriting a deficit created by a Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Conservative Government. As my right hon. Friend said, we would be elected to have particular regard to the virtues of the services provided by the public sector but, if the Maastricht treaty were in operation, we would have to embark on a programme of cuts, perhaps amounting to £30 billion in present circumstances. Therefore, it is of special interest and concern to Labour members that we do not go down that road, as it would wreck the chances of a Labour Government and the potential of the Labour party.

Mr. Shore: I thank my hon. Friend. It is extraordinary that the most senior representatives of our own party are not taking part in this debate. If they disagree with the treaty, they should say so. If they agree to accept the disciplines on their future conduct, they should explain their position.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Does not my right hon. Friend acknowledge that our right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition made it quite clear that the attempt to impose a 3 per cent. deficit limit in present circumstances would be both misguided and absurd?

Mr. Shore: Very good, but we are not talking just about this year. The forecast is that the deficit will be well in excess of the 3 per cent. limit for the next four or five years. And that is quite apart from additional programmes that my right hon. Friends may wish to introduce if we are successful in the next general election. Indeed, the absence of my right hon. and hon. Friends is extraordinary for another reason, and for the same reason this is a matter of common concern between the Government and Opposition parties.

I can best illustrate my point by referring the Committee to the PSBR record between 1972-73 and 1981-82. During those years, the requirement was never under 3 per cent. Under the Heath Government, the figures were as follows: 3·7 per cent. in 1972-73, and 5·9 per cent. in 1973-74. Under the following Labour Government, they were: 9·1 per cent. in 1974-75, 9·4 per cent. in 1975-76, 6·5 per cent. in 1976-77, 3·6 per cent. in 1977-78, and 5·4 per cent. in 1978-79. The next Conservative Government had similar problems, the figures being 4·8 per cent. in 1979-80, 5·4 per cent. in 1980-81, and 3·4 per cent. in 1981-82.

A particular Government may face very difficult problems, but these figures suggest that both parties and three successive Governments found it necessary to have a PSBR substantially in excess of the reference limit that this treaty seeks to impose.

Mr. Skinner: It is worth noting that the years to which my right hon. Friend has just referred were the great privatisation and North sea oil tax years. Now we are talking about going up to 8 per cent. I read in the Financial Times the other day a story to the effect that the Chancellor's Budget figures had been doctored. We are not talking about £35 billion for this financial year; the figure is about £10 billion worse than that. Had it not been for North sea oil and privatisation, the PSBR figures for the years between 1982 and 1989 could have been up to 8, 9 or 10 per cent. Indeed, that will probably happen before this lot are finished.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend is correct. The fact that the PSBR is very significantly less than it would otherwise have been is accounted for by the sale of publicly owned assets, bringing in £6 billion, £7 billion or more a year. My hon. Friend is absolutely right about North sea oil also. The North sea produced a great flood of revenue, particularly during the 1980s. But for that, too, there would have been a much larger PSBR.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said, with just a touch of irritation, that any attempt to impose a 3 per cent. limit would be misguided and absurd. We can all agree about that.

If Labour Members vote for this part of the treaty, that is what we shall be signing up to. Back Benchers can only marvel at the way in which the Front-Bench team seeks to evade the issue of what the text of the treaty states.

Mr. Shore: I can only agree 100 per cent. with my hon. Friend. If anyone objects to having the yoke of 3 per cent. put upon them, they should stand up and say so and vote against it. That is the message that should go out.

2 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Thanks to the unforgivable silliness of the Liberals in allowing the Government to force crucial economic measures through the night, I am not at the peak of my mental activity, which is fairly low anyway. The Liberals have forced us into the position of hurrying the measures through in the dead of the night when hon. Members are half asleep so that the Liberals can hide their shame at what is being done. Therefore, it is difficult to follow the argument.

The figures that my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) gives are those for the PSBR, but the 3 per cent. limit referred to the public sector financial deficit, which will constitute the PSBR plus the borrowing receipts from privatisation. Therefore, the deficit will be bigger than the borrowing requirement.

Mr. Shore: That was the point being made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

What deeply disturbs me is that some of my hon. Friends whose professional activity is to put a favourable gloss on the treaty try hard to say that it is not quite what it seems. The most astonishing omission from the treaty is the fact that it never faces the issue of counter-recession policy, about which it contains not a word. We all know from experience that there is a built-in cyclical movement over five or more years in a market economy—there are absolutely predictable waves of activity. There is a tendency for a boom, which then falls away into a recession. That is a common experience, not only of Governments of both parties over the years, but of the western world.

One lesson that we should have learnt from the disasters of the inter-war years was that tendency to go too high in a boom, and too low into recession and slump. Why is that aspect not written into the protocol? Why does it not say that we must recognise those counter-cyclical problems, and will certainly do so if unemployment grows by X per cent.? Instead of having merely 3 per cent. and 60 per cent. for borrowing and debt, why not have 3, 4 or 5 per cent. of the level of unemployment or the fall in gross domestic product? If such indicators were part of the protocol, we would have some reason to take seriously the arguments of those who try to gloss over the reality of the outrage that is being inflicted on us.

Mr. Betts: I agree with my right hon. Friend on the need for a counter-cyclical policy, but what does he think that the words mean in paragraph 3 of article 104c? I take them to mean exactly what my hon. Friend is advocating—the need for a counter-cyclical policy.

"other relevant factors, including the medium term economic and budgetary position of the Member State"

Mr. Shore: If that is what the treaty means, it should have been spelt out, but I do not for a moment believe that it does. The paragraph refers to the sort of run of figures provided by the Government in the Red Book so that a judgment can be made on whether the nation state is tending towards, deviating from or approximating to the 3 per cent. and 60 per cent. reference points contained in the protocol.

Mr. Skinner: Woolly statements have just been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) and others, and my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) described them as safeguards. In a nutshell, those statements mean only what the Chancellor and the Prime Minister said a few weeks or months ago about extending VAT. They are as strong as their statements when they said that they had no present plans to do so. Statements from the Common Market and from the protocol will be treated in the same fashion. They are not specific, but they will be rammed down our throats. I cannot understand why our Front-Bench spokesmen connive with the Government Front Bench when for the rest of this week they played merry hell about the Government not using precise words. But they are prepared to accept this woolly, abstract statement, because it is about their beloved Common Market. The whole thing stinks.

Mr. Shore: Some statements are later denied or withdrawn—that is a common experience—but we are not discussing statements: we are talking about a treaty, for God's sake, which is legally enforceable. That is the reason for concern. As I have said, the omission of any direct reference to deficit financing is extraordinary.

Mr. Spearing: May I relate my right hon. Friend's excellent questions and arguments to his earlier comment about the absence of the Chancellor and his opposite number? One explanation is that, if they were present, they would have to silently acquiesce to my right hon. Friend's argument or attempt to reply. Their absence during a debate deliberately brought about in the middle of the night by the Government on the major issue of our national finance shows that they do not wish to engage in the debate. That is because they cannot face my right hon. Friend's questions on behalf of our nation.

Mr. Shore: That adds to my general criticism about the sadness of this ruse to obtain a debate in the middle of the night. We are talking to ourselves, and there are only 30 or 40 of us here. We are debating an issue that could damage our people more than anything else if they knew about it. That damage will occur if they are clamped into this straitjacket. We have been tricked into a debate, thanks to Liberal connivance, late at night without being able to distinguish between one major issue and another. The Financial Secretary does not do himself any credit by grinning foolishly. It is a disgrace, and he knows it.

Mr. Leighton: Nobody is fond of deficits, but surely they should be for the judgment of the Chancellor of the day and not enshrined in an international treaty. Does my right hon. Friend agree that deficits in virtually all the Community countries are well above 3 per cent. at the moment? Can he envisage what it will mean for those countries to try to come down to 3 per cent. in a time of recession? Does he know that the Prime Minister of Belgium resigned two days ago because of a budget to reduce Belgium's deficit from 6 point something per cent. to 3 per cent? The measure could not get through, and he had to resign.

Is my right hon. Friend also aware that my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition recently said:

"If all member states of the EC tried to satisfy the 3 per cent. target by the end of 1996, . . . the combined effect on total EC output would be a reduction of over 2 per cent."

In other words, the attempt to get down to 3 per cent. by 1996 will cause another recession. Is that not crazy and a betrayal of everything that our party has ever stood for?

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend does well to remind us of the international dimension. If European countries that are clearly not conforming to the guidelines set themselves on a deflationary course of converging upon those targets, it would cause terrible damage not only to those countries and their employment, but to the international trading and economic community. It could be done terrible damage, and we could conceivably find ourselves in a 1929-31 situation.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is not the Maastricht process a grotesque double whammy—the ERM and the monetary discipline required to remain within the parities necessitated by the mechanism? Countries such as Spain have unemployment of about 20 per cent. and at the same time a whopping budget deficit. Were the budget deficit criteria to be implemented, the effect would be absolutely catastrophic. It would be like the slump of the early 1930s.

Mr. Shore: That is true. Another illustration of that is the fate of the socialist Government in France, with 3 million unemployed by conforming to a Frankfurt policy, leading to high interest rates and strong deflationary pressures. After 10 years of socialist government, something more was expected than 3 million unemployed. Incidentally, that figure existed throughout those 10 years, because France's folly was to join the ERM in 1979 and to give up those easy adjustments in the first few years, when the ERM became increasingly hard and rigid—with the results that we now know.

Another important point relates to the process of the identification of punishment under article 104c. Of course there are considerations, and judgments must be made, but we should have no doubt about the penalties.

Paragraph 9 of article 104c states:

"If a Member State persists in failing to put into practice the recommendations of the Council, the Council may decide to give notice to the Member State to take, within a specified time limit, measures for the deficit reduction which is judged necessary by the Council in order to remedy the situation.

In such a case, the Council may request the Member State concerned to submit reports in accordance with a specific timetable".

In other words, "We'll give you a couple of years to change. We want to see a new Red Book, with very different figures from those that we see now."

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): The right hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, but paragraphs 9 and 11 are knocked out by the protocol. As to the avoidance of budget deficits, one should refer to article 109e(4):

"In the second stage, Member States shall endeavour to avoid excessive government deficits."

The statement in article 104c(1) that only applies to stage 3, where the other provisions are knocked out.

"Member States shall avoid excessive government deficits"

Mr. Shore: There is that difference. I understand that avoidance is not mandatory under stage 2, but a member state is supposed to make the effort and to give evidence of it. If it does not, the Commission will monitor the member state anyway, to ascertain how far short it has fallen.

The most coercive part is article 104c(11):

"As long as a Member State fails to comply with a decision taken in accordance with paragraph 9"——

which I read——

"the Council may decide to apply or, as the case may be, intensify one or more of the following measures:

—to require the Member State concerned to publish additional information, to be specified by the Council, before issuing bonds and securities;

—to invite the European Investment Bank to reconsider its lending policy towards the Member State concerned.

—to require the Member State concerned to make a non-interest-bearing deposit of an appropriate size with the Community until the excessive deficit has, in the view of the Council, been corrected.

—to impose fines of an appropriate size."

Dr. Godman: I am sorry to keep interrupting my right hon. Friend, but these are critical questions that need to be answered in a tough scrutiny of the implications of paragraph 11, and, in the absence of a Law Officer, I need his guidance.

Can my right hon. Friend confirm that, if a state is being judged by the Council and the imposition of a fine is possible, the Minister from that state will be excluded from the Council's deliberations? In other words, will the recalcitrant state be denied representation at a meeting which may or may not decide to fine it?

2.15 am

Mr. Shore: Presumably, the Minister from the delinquent state will be called in to explain why he has not conformed to the guidelines laid down by the Council. Having given his explanation, he will be asked to leave the room so that a vote can be taken in which he will not participate.

Dr. Godman: With respect to my right hon. Friend, we are talking about a meeting of the Council. How can the Council exclude the Minister from its deliberations without infringing other articles of the treaty?

Mr. Shore: That is an interesting question, and I cannot really answer it——

Mr. Dorrell rose——

Mr. Shore: —but the Minister is going to help.

Mr. Dorrell: As the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) rightly says, we are talking about a meeting of the Council. The member state whose record is under scrutiny will be represented in the normal way, and the Minister can contribute to the discussion; the only change is that the Minister will not be able to take part in the qualified majority vote.

Mr. Shore: The Council can, if it wishes, use an incredible series of powers to impose penalties on a recalcitrant member state that exceeds the so-called deficit.

Mr. Dorrell: I think that I misled the House in a minor way when I used the phrase "qualified majority". I should have referred to

"two thirds of the votes of its members weighted in accordance with article 148(2), excluding the votes of the representative of the Member State concerned."

Mr. Shore: I am grateful for that information, but it does not change the position much.

Here, then, is a British Minister representing a state that has offended against some economic theory that has no basis in any serious economic analysis of what is a proper and appropriate public sector borrowing requirement, but is nevertheless written into the treaty. That state is treated —to use a phrase employed by one of my hon. Friends —like a rate-capped local authority. We are talking about a massive, indeed humiliating, transfer of power and self-government to European institutions. I do not understand how any Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any shadow Chancellor, could tolerate it for a moment. One of the reasons why we shall press the matter to a vote is that this is no probing amendment, but one that goes to the heart of British politics.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Shore: It is splendid to see such energy, but I want to say a little about economic policy relating to matters other than deficits.

Mr. Spearing: On that point, if the proposals are accepted, can my right hon. Friend think of any purpose in having general elections in future? Will it matter tuppence who is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it is a Conservative, Labour or even a Liberal Chancellor, because decisions will be taken elsewhere?

Mr. Shore: That is a serious question, and, in conjunction with the issues that we discussed in our debate on the previous group of amendments, it requires a serious answer. Are we to have any major controls left over the conduct of our own economic policy? I find it amazing that we should be trapped into a late-night debate on such a crucial matter, which affects the welfare, prosperity and future of our country, without even the possibility of studying Hansard between debates.

Mr. Cryer: In effect, my right hon. Friend is describing what would happen if a Labour Minister of a duly elected Government went to Brussels and returned to tell pensioners and patients of the national health service that there will have to be cuts, that there will be no investment in the national health service, and that there can be no assurance that there will be an adequate number of nurses or hospitals, because we lost the vote and the final decision was taken by other people. Can my right hon. Friend imagine a more wretched, humbling and appalling position for a Labour Chancellor to be in? Moreover, people will ask, "Weren't you part of the Labour party which agreed to the treaty as it went through Parliament?"

Mr. Shore: I do not think that we can use words too strong to condemn these provisions. We may argue among ourselves about whether we see a future wholly in Europe and so on. Some people are wildly keen federalists, and I can understand and even respect their position, but I do not understand how anyone can agree to these terms. Not only do I not understand; I have contempt for people who recommend that the British Parliament and people should have these restraints imposed on them. It is outrageous.

Other powers are also being taken away, not only control of public deficits and national debt ratios to GDP. Economic policy in general is to be taken over. After our previous debate, I am not sure how much economic policy will be left. Article 103 states:

"Member States shall regard their economic policies as a matter of common concern", which is perhaps not too awful a statement. But it continues:

"The Council shall, acting by a qualified majority on a recommendation from the Commission, formulate a draft for the broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and of the Community".

What is covered by that? The answer is economic policies. It presumably covers anything dealt with by the Department of Trade and Industry and what was once the Department of Energy.

Mr. Rowlands: Paragraph after paragraph of article 103 contains references to new powers being given to the Commission. The idea has been presented to us that, through subsidiarity, the Commission would be pushed out of the nooks and crannies of our lives. Is not the Commission prepared to give up those nooks and crannies because it is to gain new powers to go into every economic nook and cranny of our society? That is what article 103 is all about.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend is right. If I were a Brussels Commissioner, I should willingly give up powers over the nooks and crannies, the small change of regulating conditions in English zoos, for example, in exchange for the powers of control over the whole British economy.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the right hon. Gentleman share my fear that, if we foolishly allowed this country to be committed to this aspect of this ghastly treaty, we should be encouraging the growth of a black economy, as has happened in other parts of the world? Where the economic circumstances have produced chaos, which Governments have been unable to control, the black economy has thrived. The British people are enterprising, and that would certainly be the outcome of that sort of nonsense.

Mr. Shore: The results would be extremely serious—a total loss of faith in representative government and alienation from laws and policies imposed upon the British people by alien institutions in Europe. All that would be there. People would indeed feel massively betrayed.

I shall finish with my point about the Commission and the Council. Article 103(4) says:

"Where it is established, under the procedure . . . that the economic policies of a Member State are not consistent with the broad guidelines referred to".

That means, "if a nation states wishes to pursue a certain kind of policy". Nation states might still do that; there are still some differences left between political parties, and one party in power might pursue a policy marginally different from that pursued by another. If a nation state's policies are "not consistent with the broad guidelines", or if they

There we are. The nation state will be put in the stocks and the international community will be invited to throw rotten fruit at us until we are allowed out.

Mr. Spearing: I wholeheartedly endorse my right hon. Friend's powerful argument. Is he aware that I have it on good authority that, even before the passage of the treaty, there has been a request from somewhere within the bosom of the Community for Governments to submit a programme for convergence? Various Governments have had to respond to that request.

I do not think that the request has been made public, and I do not know whether the Government intend to make their response public, but when the Financial Secretary replies tonight—or rather, when he makes what I hope will be his opening speech—perhaps he will tell us whether such a request has already been received, and if so, whether it has been made public in this country, whether the Government will respond to it, and how we are to hear about it. Surely what my right hon. Friend says may result from the treaty is already upon us: people are presupposing a request that may come afterwards.

Mr. Shore: I think that that matter will be explored again in the next debate, if we are so foolish as to rush on and try to take in stages 1, 2 and 3 of the approach to economic and monetary union, which will be the subject of the third economic debate. It would be wrong to go on to that debate without having had time to consider what has been said in the first two economic debates.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that article 103(4), which he mentioned, contains at least an implicit risk that pressure may be put on the United Kingdom to waive its opt-out, and that our Parliament will be expected to agree before we move to stage 3 of the EMU? The article says that, if a nation's policies

"risk jeopardizing the proper functioning of economic and monetary union, the Council may, acting by a qualified majority on a recommendation from the Commission, make the necessary recommendations to the Member State concerned."

In other words, if we are still laggards towards the end of the 1990s, notwithstanding the views of this Parliament we may come under serious pressure from the Council to move to stage 3 of the EMU.

Mr. Shore: Indeed. There are several powers—for example, those allowing criticism to be made public—which, although they fall just short of the extreme penalties in stage 3, would be greatly damaging to any country, especially in relation to markets, currencies and matters of confidence. The availability of the weapon of publicity and criticism is bound to be an important factor in stages 1 and 2, before we reach the final stage.

We have discussed today the two crucial powers of the British Parliament over the British economy that remain now that we have lost the power to control our trade and have transferred many other decisions to the European Community. I refer to the two powers that are crucial to macro-economic management—control over one's interest and exchange rate, and the power to decide one's own public sector borrowing requirement and the whole stance of one's budget. If we surrender both those powers in the middle of the night, we shall have done badly by the British people.

2.30 am

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am delighted to follow the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who has done the Committee and the House a great service by both his speeches today. The example that the right hon. Gentleman and some of his right hon. and hon. Friends, together with my hon. Friends, have set, represents the modest safeguard that we still possess in honouring our democratic procedures in the country and the House of Commons. As the Committee knows, immense pressure has been brought to bear upon those hon. Members, of whichever party, to minimise their opposition to the unnecessary, obsolete and irrelevant treaty on which we are spending so much time. It is an immense pleasure to follow the right hon. Gentleman, whose leadership on this matter I have always respected.

I read with interest an article by one Anatole Kaletsky in The Times of 18 March. I hope that the Committee will allow me to quote briefly from that article, which follows through the argument that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney has presented to us—especially in the latter part of his speech, which related to economic policy. The article states:

"The astounding figure of £50 billion for the public sector borrowing requirement was the clearest possible reminder of how badly the economy has been managed in the past, and of what a crippling burden the whole country must bear"— at this point, the article is slightly critical of the Treasury—

"to keep a handful of complacent Treasury officials in their ivory tower at Great George Street. But even more alarming evidence of the Treasury's grip on the Major Government came in the budget "Red Book", showing tax revenues and economic projections for five years ahead."

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney referred more than once to the Red Book.

The article continues:

"These figures reveal that Mr. Lamont's tax increases of £10·5 billion from 1995 onwards will be nowhere near sufficient to plug the gap in public finances, if the Treasury's present expectations about the economy are fulfilled. In fact, if the economy grows from 1994 onwards at the Treasury's assumed average rate of 2·75 per cent. a year, Britain will still have a Government deficit"—

I believe that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney mentioned this—

"of 4·75 per cent. of GDP in the last year of the present parliament."

I hope that my hon. Friends on the Front Bench will bear that in mind.

"Even after Mr. Lamont's new exactions, Britain would in 1996 be guilty of a 'gross fiscal error' as defined at Maastricht. Thus, if Mr. Major ever succeeded in getting his treaty ratified, Britain would face great pressure to increase taxes at that time by another £11 billion annually to meet the Maastricht criteria and fulfil Mr. Major's longing to be at 'the heart of Europe'."

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I am grateful to my Friend for drawing to the attention of the Committee important material that has been overlooked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is clear from my hon. Friend's remarks, if they are true, that the Government have embarked on an economic policy, underpinned in the Budget, that is massively out of line with what is required today. We need a policy for more vigorous growth, enabling the figures which my hon. Friend quoted to become irrelevant.

Mr. Winterton: I am not sure whether my close and hon. Friend, a Member whom I greatly admire, is trying to be helpful to me and my argument or to the occupants of the Treasury Bench. I endorse his view. If only the Chancellor realised what was going on at the grass roots his Budget would have been different because we need, above all, an expansion of the economy and the stimulation of economic growth.

I do not want to start a debate about the objectives of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, which I launched here a few weeks ago. That alliance has the objectives that my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) outlined. But if my hon. Friend supports Maastricht—I believe he has in the past—he will not be able to achieve what he wants because, as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney forefully said, everything we are discussing will restrict growth and create higher unemployment, so creating a vicious circle.

As I pointed out in an intervention, a million jobs are costing the British Government £8 billion, so our present deficit could pale into insignificance, particularly when we consider a previous debate and the establishment of a European central bank, staffed and adminstered by unelected people to whom the Government of the day could not make representations.

The Minister, when replying briefly and inadequately to that debate, said that hon. Members could make their views known to the Government, and the officials of the central bank might, if the Official Report of the debate were brought to their attention, realise that there was concern. But what influence would an hon. Member here have with those officials in the European central bank whose salaries would make ours look like petty cash and who would disregard almost entirely the views of the properly elected Members of this Parliament?

Dr. Godman: I remind the hon. Gentleman of the role that the central bank will play in the scheme of things. At the start of the third stage, the monetary committee, which will play a powerful role in the disciplining of states, will be replaced by an economic and financial committee to which the central bank will have a right of appointment. the central bank will be fully involved, having membership of the successor body to the monetary committee.

Mr. Winterton: The hon. Gentleman, who has intervened several times in the debate with great effect, has made another good point. I entirely endorse every word that he uttered.

Mr. Gill: Is my hon. Friend basing his exposition on a technical understanding of the economic matters involved or on his superb common sense?

Mr. Winterton: It is interesting that we are getting absolutely no reaction from the Government Front Bench. It may be that, because I have some knowledge of manufacturing industry and what is required, throughout the debate I have adopted a practical, responsible, sensible and earthy approach to the economic difficulties which the country faces.

Mr. Cryer: As the hon. Gentleman is pursuing that analogy in his illustration of this party's position on this group of amendments—and before we reach the Single European Act in this stage of integration—may I tell him that, when a Committee upstairs was dealing with an order which allowed garments to be marked with the source of manufacture, the then Minister in the Conservative Government, Mrs. Oppenheim, said clearly that we should not at any stage suggest that the order was designed to protect manufacturing industry because the Commission would be listening to our remarks in Committee in order to take action against the order if it was a trade barrier? The order was designed only to help consumers. That was before we reached the solemn stage of dealing with this treaty. If that was the argument of Ministers 10 years ago, what position have we now reached?

Mr. Winterton: I can only agree with what the hon. Gentleman says. He enables me to mention a parliamentary question to the President of the Board of Trade which I tabled only a few days ago. Another objective of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, which I hope will assist in the regeneration of the manufacturing base of the United Kingdom, was to get the Government to identify areas of potential for import substitution.

Sir Teddy Taylor: It is illegal.

Mr. Winterton: Indeed. My hon. Friend has immediately latched on to the unfortunate, sad, disappointing and depressing reply which I received from the President of the Board of Trade. The Minister said that the Government could not do that because it would be considered an impediment to free trade. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) says that it could be defined as a Euro-crime.

Is it wrong that the Government, in seeking to build up our economy as part of their economic policy—this group of amendments is about economic policy and deficits—and with the intention of reducing the trade deficit and, as a result, the Government deficit on their current account, would be prevented by the European Community from identifying areas of manufacturing capacity to regenerate the manufacturing base of the United Kingdom?

I cannot believe that that should in any event be described as a Euro-crime. It would be offensive to this country, as it seeks to build up its economy, to be restricted in doing so by the European Community. The position would be made worse if we ratified the Maastricht treaty.

The overwhelming reason for the length and depth of the United Kingdom recession has been the policy—sadly, of my Government—of shadowing the deutschmark and then joining the European exchange rate mechanism. Many Conservative Members, as well as Opposition right hon. and hon. Members, urged that we should not join the ERM. The Government ignored us, and even entered at a rate that was always outrageously irresponsible and could never have been maintained. We know what happened.

2.45 am

Mr. Skinner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Winterton: I am happy to give way to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who is an immense parliamentarian, whatever people may think of his views.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman is trying to increase my majority in Bolsover.

The hon. Gentleman said that people like himself were against entering the ERM. It was the same on this side of the House. I remember the manifesto meeting of the Labour party before the last general election. It ought to be placed on record that my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and I moved an amendment to the Labour manifesto that we should not take part in the ERM and a Labour Government should withdraw from it. We lost that vote by 37 votes to two at a joint meeting of the shadow Cabinet and the NEC. All the marshmallows and pseudo-lefts and all the other rag, tag and bobtails went along with it. What happened? Within a few months the whole thing had collapsed. People on our Front Bench still talked about possibly returning to the ERM. It is like a dog returning to its vomit.

Mr. Winterton: I accept much of what the hon. Member for Bolsover has just said, if not the tone of it. I have a sizeable majority in Macclesfield, as he does in Bolsover. I can only say to those on the Treasury Bench that perhaps some who are considered minorities are right. It is only a pity that the Government do not listen to those with some experience and those who have been consistent in the views that they have expressed.

My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will know that the United Kingdom was first into recession and has, overall, been much harder hit than any other OECD country. No other OECD economy has contracted over two years as Britain has done. Other economies have done so much more slowly. They are slowing down, but they are still growing. That includes one of the important markets for the United Kingdom. I refer, of course, to the United States of America. Far be it from Britain to be dominated by Europe and look to Europe for its future. I believe that Britain should look to north America and the Pacific rim, where the real wealth is being created and economic growth is a major feature.

Mr. Gill: Is it not wrong that we should do almost 60 per cent. of our trade with only 6 per cent. of the world's population and only 40 per cent. of our trade with 94 per cent. of the world's population? Would any business man regard that as a balanced debtors list? Would he not seek to expand his business and open more accounts with more people?

Mr. Winterton: As I come from a small business background, my answer to my hon. Friend, who also has a career as a successful business man, is in the affirmative. He would expect it to be in the affirmative.

Unfortunately, the Government are severely influenced by the Treasury, and far too few people in the Treasury have any real experience of industry and making money. They merely spend other people's money.

I quote from a leader published on 4 March 1993 in The Daily Telegraph, a paper not unknown to be favourable to the Government:

"The Government has had no coherent economic policy since Black Wednesday. It is this vacuum at the heart of Government which produces the caution and scepticism which so annoy Mr. Major."

I quote that not to be helpful to my party or Treasury Ministers, but to be hopeful for the debate in the House of Commons.

I am sick and tired of the Government being totally committed to Europe and oblivious to what is going on elsewhere in the world. If they realised that there was a bigger and better world outside Europe, we should start to get some economic leadership and the British economy would begin to recover.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend in full flow, but he refers to a void at the heart of British economic policy. Is not that void the great question mark over whether we will re-enter the ERM? Until the Government publicly eschew that option and say that we will not re-enter, uncertainty and lack of confidence will persist. We have been burnt once and thousands of people have been put out of work quite unnecessarily. Were that to happen again, it would be quite unforgivable.

Mr. Winterton: I entirely endorse the views of my hon. Friend, who anticipated the remarks I was about to make.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that such uncertainty does not exist? Has he seen the "European Special" issued by Conservative MEPs to every constituency office, in which it is made abundantly clear that the Government intend to allow sterling to return to the ERM? So there is no doubt about it. Not only does the treaty indicate that we have to, but the MEPs' paper which is about to be published—and they are to move into central office at Smith square—makes it abundantly clear.

The Conservative manifesto said that we were going to move into the narrow band of the ERM. Does my hon. Friend agree that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) was in danger of misleading the Committee by saying that there was some doubt? Is it not abundantly clear that we are going back into the ERM? There is no doubt about it whatsoever, and it will be another great disaster for jobs.

Mr. Winterton: As yet, I am not able to speak for the Government. I am not being immodest when I say that there are some who believe that I might make a better job on the Treasury Bench than some of those who occupy it now.

Mr. Cash: Just in case my hon. Friend should be in any doubt whatsoever about the Government's position, I hope that, in common with other hon. Members, he noted that, when my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) made his point about that scurrilous piece of paper from the European People's party, the Minister nodded his head in agreement and is now nodding again, so there is no doubt that the Government intend to take us back into the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Winterton: Having sat through many hours of the debate today, my hon. Friend the Minister indicated that there was an option to re-enter the ERM, but, not seeking to be unfair to my hon. Friend or to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, let me say that they have made it clear that we will not go back into the European exchange rate mechanism until the Government believe that it is right to do so. By that, they imply that it would be in the interests of this country to do so.

Before I give way to my hon. Friend on the Front Bench, may I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East that it is absolutely scandalous that the money which the Conservative party raises has gone to produce this ridiculously nonsensical, irresponsible, irrelevant and obsolete document from the Euro-MPs who are members of the Conservative party.

Mr. Cash: The European People's party. It is nothing to do with us.

Mr. Winterton: Or the European People's party, which, I am afraid, undoubtedly receives money from the United Kingdom's contribution to the European committee. But I do not think, Mr. Lofthouse, that you wish us to go into that matter.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Winterton: Please would my hon. Friends contain themselves? I see my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary pensive and pregnant with anticipation of the question that he is going to put to me.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but, rather than have my views attributed to me and then have some of my hon. Friends say that I was indicating assent to their formulation of the Government's policy, perhaps I may be allowed to confirm what I said two or three hours ago, which is that the Government's policy in relation to the exchange rate mechanism is to return to it when we consider it to be in this country's interest to do so.

Mr. Winterton: I entirely disagree with the policy of going back in, but I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that I interpreted what he said some three hours ago fairly accurately in my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Winterton: I shall give way in just a moment——

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Winterton: I am delighted to give way to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), a fellow officer of the all-party media group, not least because I am attracted by his tie.

Mr. Mitchell: The position that the Minister has just given us is a much closer advance to membership than the position when we came out, which was that we would not go back until the fundamental fault lines of the ERM had been repaired.

Mr. Winterton: I know that this sounds repetitive, but again I can only agree with everything that the hon. Gentleman has just said. Certainly, when we came out, it was my understanding of the Government's position that we would not go back in until the whole thing had been reviewed and restructured. We have seen it in the sort of drip, drip, drip syndrome that we have become accustomed to from this Government. We have been told that certain things will not happen, but, in case they do happen at some time in the future, we are building up the structure to enable them to happen.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend, with his business background, agree with me that one of the problems of making business decisions is trying to forecast the position in six or 12 months' time? Part of the problem of decision-making, in which I have often been involved, is having to make a judgment based on what one thinks will be the future economic and political circumstances. It is particularly important when one is interested in overseas markets, something in which companies are interested. Therefore, a statement to the effect that we will go back into the ERM when the Government judge that the circumstances are right is much worse than a clear-cut statement to the effect that we will join and these are the circumstances under which we will join, clearly laid out —and we have not had that—or, alternatively, a statement to the effect that we will not join at all. Either of these allows decisions to be made.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend, in yet another excellent intervention, has made a point that I trust the Treasury Bench will note. Those of us who are in business and have to take decisions for which we are accountable in every sense of the word need decisions, and I say to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that one of the reasons why I am strongly opposed to this protocol on the excessive deficit procedure is that a country might well need to have much more than 3 per cent. of gross domestic product as a deficit for a limited period in order to achieve a certain objective.

It is the same in business—one can borrow heavily. I advocate borrowing heavily only when one expects to get the money back with a profit that will enable one to pay back the debt. My hon. Friend's comments are extremely important.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend may not know that an interesting paper was prepared—it seems by Treasury officials—entitled, "Sterling in the ERM: Lessons from the September 1992 Crisis". It happened to arrive in my post in a brown envelope and is otherwise known as a leaked document. My hon. Friend may find it interesting to know that, with respect to the manner in which those things are supposed to be dealt with, the document states:

"The results of these discussions should be communicated by the officials concerned to Finance Ministers. Special meetings of Finance Ministers are best avoided since they attract such public attention. Secure video conference facilities would enable Finance Ministers to talk to each other without meeting."

There is much more, as I shall explain to the Committee when I have an opportunity to speak. It is a remarkable inside document on what really goes on and what Ministers are up to.

Mr. Winterton: I hope that my hon. Friend will be prepared to make that document available to his colleagues and to let it lie on the Table, although perhaps the Chair would not consider it to be a state paper. It appears that it may come from some official source and it may also indicate official advice to Ministers from qualified people within a Government Department, and it is therefore relevant for it to be drawn to the attention of the Committee.

Dr. Godman: Given that we small band of men and women are engaged upon the parliamentary task of scrutinising the documents, line by line, I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman can help me. Can a member state, bedevilled by severe economic difficulties, seek a derogation from the provisions of article 104c?

Mr. Winterton: Like the hon. Gentleman, I am not a lawyer. On many occasions during the debate he has said that it would be most helpful to the deliberations of the Committee if a Law Officer, such as the Attorney-General, were here to assist us with the sort of question that he has asked me as a Government Back Bencher.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The answer is no.

3 am

Mr. Winterton: Exactly. My hon. Friend has anticipated my response. The answer to that question would be no. Any derogation would have to be granted before the treaty is ratified and signed, so the country suffering exceptional economic difficulties could not seek a derogation. I presume that under the protocol on the excessive deficit procedure, and other procedures that go with it, an explanation could be provided to that errant member country, and perhaps a less severe penalty would be imposed. I am being gracious and courteous towards the rather repressive and oppressive procedures that are laid down and that inhibit growth and the freedom of Governments to deal with the problems of their economy.

It is not in the Government's interests to emphasise that the plight of the United Kingdom is worse than that of any other country, or to point the finger of blame at the ERM. We all know that the ERM is to blame, but high interest rates to keep our exchange rates in line with those of Germany have wreaked havoc on business. As I have intimated in interventions, they also account for 1 million of the more than 3 million people who are unemployed. It is as simple as that. As we are talking also about deficits, I repeat that, in this respect, the Government's European policy is costing this country £8 billion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend has obviously studied this matter very carefully. Perhaps he could clarify something that I do not understand. If a member state, under article 104c, is instructed to increase taxes very substantially because of an excessive PSBR, and if the result is more unemployment and an even greater PSBR, is that state automatically fined for following instructions?

Mr. Winterton: This is one of the points made very dramatically and forcefully by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney.

Sir Teddy Taylor: What is the answer?

Mr. Winterton: The answer is that I assume that such a state would be fined.

Sir Teddy Taylor: For doing what it had been told?

Mr. Winterton: Indeed—for creating a deficit even greater than the one that was the cause of its being hauled before the monitor in the first place.

Mr. Wilkinson: In the most unfortunate absence of the Attorney-General, can my hon. Friend tell us what the outcome would be if a member state were fined for not keeping within the protocol's criteria on budget deficit and national debt? Refusal to pay the fine would seem to be the sensible course. Why should the misery of the people concerned be compounded?

Mr. Winterton: If this country were to follow the example of many members of the European Community —France, Italy, Holland, Belgium and even Germany—it would ignore most of the directives and regulations that are unhelpful. Those countries accept such directives and regulations but never implement them; and by the time the Commission catches up, it is too late, and the benefit has been gained.

As my hon. Friends have said, the Government want to return to the ERM, despite its dramatically damaging cost.

Mr. Cash: I can confirm what my hon. Friend has said. The document from which I have already quoted, which was published—"published" is the wrong word; it was written—on 23 December 1992, concludes:

"Sterling should re-enter the ERM when the following conditions have been met: German interest rates have come down; the Bundesbank in particular accepts the new parity as realistic . . . Sterling should re-enter with a narrow band."

In other words, the advice that is being given includes clear commitment. My hon. Friend may find that these conclusions are of some assistance.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend, not for the first time, has anticipated the point of what is almost my next sentence. The Maastricht treaty, whose ratification we are considering, will commit the United Kingdom to returning to the ERM under the second stage of European monetary union. We could be committed to doing that from 1 January next—nine or 10 months away. We would be returning to the horror of that cage—indeed, the ERM —that caused so much trouble in this country, and at least one million job losses.

The Conservative Government believe that they have an opt-out of the third stage of EMU, and can decide later whether or not to join the single currency.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, whose speech I am enjoying—he will no doubt have the opportunity to resume his speech—but I beg to move, That strangers do withdraw.

Notice being taken that strangers were present, the FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN, pursuant to Standing Order No. 143 (Withdrawal of strangers from House), put forthwith the Question, That strangers do withdraw:—

The Committee proceeded to a Division—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I understand that we are having difficulty over the Doorkeepers, many of whom will be needed later in the morning. The Doors to my immediate left and my immediate right are locked, so hon. Members will have to use the other Doors.

The Committee having divided: Ayes 0, Noes 183.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Timothy Wood and
Mr. Robert G. Hughes.

Question accordingly negatived.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Given the reduced number of doorkeepers on duty, will you confirm that if there are to be more Divisions throughout the night, the doors that remain locked are those over your right shoulder, and those over my left shoulder?

The First Deputy Chairman: Yes, I can confirm that.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: When my contribution to the important debate on this group of amendments was interrupted some minutes ago, I was advising the Committee that the Government believe that they have an opt-out from stage 3 of European monetary union and can decide later whether or not to join the single currency. I remind the Committee that under article 109m of the treaty of Rome, the Commission or another member state can take the United Kingdom to the European Court of Justice for not behaving "in the common interest". I submit, therefore, that opt-outs are probably not worth the paper they are written on. We should not base support for the Maastricht treaty on an opt-out that is as yet untested in the European Court.

It was mentioned in an earlier debate—but this has a major bearing on Government economic policy—that under the treaty we are likely to surrender certain rights to the European central bank. They include our ability to control interest and exchange rates, to issue bank notes, control foreign reserves, and—particularly relevant to this group of amendments—to control the level of Government deficit. Government spending and policies would therefore be handed over to six unelected bankers in Germany—I am not sure yet whether the central bank will be in Bonn or Frankfurt. As the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney made clear, they will have an eight-year tenure and can only serve one tenure. As they can serve only one tenure, the bankers will not care whether they please or displease.

We know, because we have been told, that those individuals can be removed by the European Court of Justice only on a technicality, not for getting their policies wrong. Here in the Westminster Parliament, if a Government get their policies wrong and lose the support of the people, they can be turned out after four or five years. That does not apply to these distinguished individuals, these highly remunerated individuals, these individuals who ultimately need not be accountable for their policies, whatever problems they create for the countries that comprise the European Community.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend may be glad to know that, referring to the central bank's governors, this remarkable document states:

> "Since there will always be a trade-off between domestic macro-economic management and exchange rate policy, this aim is perhaps utopian."

Even this extraordinary document admits that the basis on which the decisions are made is utopian: in other words, the authors do not even believe in it themselves.

Mr. Winterton: I believe that the author of "Utopia" was Sir Thomas More. There is a plaque commemorating him in Westminster Hall. Perhaps we are fortunate to be as close to Utopia in this country as we will ever be. I would not want that Utopia to be in any way diluted by a system in which all our affairs were controlled by the European central bank, whether based in Frankfurt or in Bonn.

Around such a bank, as I think we are all aware from the excellent speeches made so far, will be an immensely powerful group of people whom I have already described. For example, according to the statistics that I have before me, under Maastricht control the convertible currency reserves of all member states, which totalled £1,761 billion at the end of 1991, will inevitably become subject to fund management by the new European central bank.

Banking and currency businesses will take thousands of jobs away from an organisation not so very far from the Palace of Westminster—the City of London. Yes, this new set-up—this new central bank of Europe, or European central bank—could well deprive London and its financial centre of thousands of jobs. The City of London originally grew up around the Bank of England. As the Bank of England becomes a branch of the European central bank, perhaps rather a second-rate branch—it is all here in the treaty—so the City of London, which is important to the country and its economy, will contract. With Maastricht, we are committed to a re-run of the past three years—to a slowing and then a shrinking of our economy.

My interest in industry leads me to the subject of convergence. The requirement in the treaty for convergence is one of the most important policies affecting industry in this country, and Britain will be committed to it irrespective of the opt-outs—or whatever they were—negotiated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. As the Committee will know, convergence consists of financing the industries of less well-developed European countries so that they can compete with our own. In other words—I think that this has been said before by hon. Members who are concerned about the treaty—Maastricht will set up an industrial equivalent of the common agricultural policy.

How many hon. Members who are present at this early hour of the morning are aware that many of our traditional industries have already faced severe competition from some of the new members of the European Community? I refer in particular to Portugal and Spain. The paper and board industry, with which I have been closely involved for many years, has lost not only through companies collapsing but through thousands of jobs going to Spain, in particular, and to a lesser extent to Portugal because of the assistance that those countries receive from various structural and improvement funds, to which we are the second largest contributor. We are positively contributing to transfer of jobs from the United Kingdom to other EC countries.

3.30 am

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend is making a crucial point. The British public would be horrified, and I hope that his speech will percolate through. Are there not first three EC countries with which we have a balance of payments surplus—Ireland, Spain and Greece? We no longer have one with Portugal. If the transfer of funds under the Maastricht process continues, there will not be one member of the European Community with which the United Kingdom has a balance of payments surplus.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I entirely endorse his view. If the people of this country realised what the Government were doing in their name, they would be extremely angry and would respond appropriately when the opportunity arose. It is vital that the United Kingdom does not accept the proposals.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is not in his place at the moment, but he is extremely well informed about the common agricultural policy. It is notorious for its cost and its waste. As many hon. Members are aware, it costs £1,000 a year for every four-person household in Britain. It is depleted by fraud and inefficiency, and only about 50 per cent. of every £1 reaches the farmers for whom it is intended. As I have said, the budget which is drained by the CAP is a budget to which the United Kingdom is the second biggest contributor.

I now touch on an issue to which I trust that the House will turn its attention later today if the business managers permit it. In March this year, The Guardian—a newspaper that I read although I do not always agree with it—pointed out that the United Kingdom pays France enough money for electric power to keep the equivalent of six British coal pits in operation. Six mines, in addition to those which we hope will be reprieved by the President of the Board of Trade later today, could be kept open, but we pay the money to France instead and put our miners out of work.

Convergence under the Maastricht treaty will mean the United Kingdom paying more money, hand over first, to industries in Spain, Portugal, Greece and Ireland. A number of hon. Members—no doubt including some of those facing me across the Chamber—might believe that that is a good thing. In the past year or two, I motored through Spain on my way to a holiday in Portugal. I was appalled by the number of road projects for which those countries have received funding from the European Community, making them more attractive and competitive than the United Kingdom. The people of this country do not want or support that. I believe that if they knew that it was going on to that extent they would register their firm opposition with the Government.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Winterton: I am delighted to give way to the president of the Liberal Democrats, with whom, despite our many differences, I share considerable common ground.

Mr. Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but he is systematically slashing to bits those of us who are attempting to contribute to the debate before we even intervene. I do not know to which road projects he specifically referred, but I suggest that countries such as Spain may appear to have more road infrastructure projects supported by EC funding because, unlike this country, they do not systematically and persistently abuse the concept of additionality for European regional development fund cash.

Mr. Winterton: I am not sure whether I have the information readily to hand to be able to answer the hon. Gentleman's question fully, as normally I would wish to do, but I can tell him that the United Kingdom, perhaps stupidly, is one of the most honourable countries in the Community and implements any regulation or directive that the Government accept, even if they have accepted it unwillingly. We cross all the t's, dot all the i's and put full stops at the end of all the sentences. We are as communautaire, as honourable, as any country in the Community. Indeed, in my view we are considerably more honourable than most.

I am not sure what sort of response to his question the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) expected from me.

Mr. Kennedy rose——

Mr. Winterton: I give way to the hon. Gentleman again, if he insists.

Mr. Kennedy: How could the hon. Gentleman know what kind of reply I wanted? I did not expect the reply that he gave but, equally, he will not have expected me to agree with the one that I thought that he would give. I did not want to agree with that in the first place.

Mr. Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is always most courteous and most charming, and it is difficult to disagree with him in an aggressive way. He seems to agree with the response that I actually did give him, although I could not reply to the specific question that he asked.

It has not been mentioned much in our debates that convergence is a critical cost upon the people and the industry of this country. Some people argue that, if Britain finances the development of other EC countries they will then become customers of Britain's manufacturing companies and take our goods. The falsity of that idea is shown by the trade figures to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has already alluded. The only EC countries with which the United Kingdom has a favourable balance of trade are two of the three poorest nations. That does not suggest that, as the Government may say, the more money we pour into other countries and the better we make them, the more business we shall do with them. The record shows that that does not happen.

Because of my total commitment to the role of manufacturing industry in the economy of this country, I again ask the Government why, if they believe in spending money to invest in industry, they do not invest in United Kingdom industry. I ask that with a great deal of venom, and I repeat what I said earlier in my short contribution to the debate—that when I sought to concentrate the mind of a responsible Department, the Department of Trade and Industry, on areas in which we might achieve import substitution and a regeneration of sectors of this country's manufacturing base, I got from the Minister for Industry the unhelpful response that the Department could not possibly do that because it would contravene the treaty of Rome, and the Commission would come down on us like a ton of bricks. What a load of wimps they are. Is it not about time that we stood up for the interests of manufacturing industry and jobs in the United Kingdom?

My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has been sitting on the Front Bench for rather too long. I am amazed that he has not been relieved, as I believe that merits——

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the tragedies of the Government's policy on the trade matters to which he is referring is that we are running a multi-billion pound deficit with the European Community? We are in an absolutely ridiculous situation. We are receiving orders from unelected officials and subscribing to a Euro-framework—which, good though it may be in theory, needs to be sorted—while at the same time running that massive deficit.

Mr. Winterton: Yes, and our deficit with Europe has been increasing ever since we joined. I have long believed that the United Kingdom should look to the four corners of the world for trade and customers and should not be blinded by Europe or concentrate all its efforts on the European Community. One day, we shall learn that the European Community is only a small part of the overall trading world. We should look to north America, where the economy is growing rather faster than almost anywhere in Europe. I believe that there are rich pickings to be had if only we would turn our eyes in that direction.

I pay tribute to the Government for one or two of the measures that they introduced in the Budget—not least the increase in the moneys available under Export Credits Guarantee Department schemes and the more competitive premiums now available to industry. That will undoubtedly enable the United Kingdom to bid for very important contracts in the far east, Indonesia and elsewhere, where there are, I repeat, very rich pickings as regards employment and manufacturing.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): My hon. Friend and I were heavily involved in trying to secure for British Aerospace the deal that it has recently secured with Taiwan Aerospace. My hon. Friend knows the great importance of British Aerospace both to our constituents and to the United Kingdom in general. He will also, I believe, have received from British Aerospace—I shall be surprised if he has not—a letter asking Parliament to ratify the Maastricht treaty immediately because the company feels that it is of major importance to it. Will my hon. Friend address that point, as he gives me the impression that he believes that there is some conflict of interest—a belief which British Aerospace, one of the major employers, does not seem to share?

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend tempts me to start my speech again, but I know that you, Mr. Lofthouse, would not wish me to go back over the brief comments that I have made so far. If my hon. Friend had read one of those distinguished, more serious newspapers on Sunday—I refer to The Sunday Telegraph, although I believe that the story also appeared elsewhere—he would be aware that a certain amount of disinformation and misinformation is being peddled—[Interruption.] I shall come to inward investment in a moment. A great deal of disinformation is being peddled about the support of industry for the Maastricht treaty. The Institute of Directors, which is surely fairly representative of big business, is strongly opposed to the Maastrich treaty, for a number of the reasons that I have spelt out to the Committee during my speech.

I know from my knowledge of many members of the CBI that they, too, oppose Maastricht, as do many small business men. But with the political patronage available to Government, certain people who head major companies and who in the past, by tradition, have automatically been rewarded with honours, have done what they perceive is expected of them. I refer without malice, for example, to the chairman of ICI, who was a signatory with other leading business men—the Arnold Weinstocks of this world, the leaders of British Aerospace and others. I am not sure that they are committed to Maastricht in a meaningful way. Indeed, I am not sure that any of them have read the Maastricht treaty, together with or separately from the Single Act and the treaty of Rome, although all three must be read to understand the position fully.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is it not a fact that major aerospace companies, such as British Aerospace, have collaborated over the years with European and other partners, as Boeing co-operates with the Japanese, the Italians and many others, on purely commercial and technical grounds? They find the partners who best suit their commercial and technical requirements. It has nothing to do with Maastricht.

3.45 am

Mr. Winterton: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend who, speaking from the heart and the head—because few in the Committee know as much about certain sectors of industry, including aerospace, as he does—puts it in a nutshell.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) drew my attention to certain senior executives of British Aerospace. I could introduce him to many executives who take a totally contrary view over the ratification of Maastricht. But does our ratification of it make the slightest difference to the excellent arrangement that British Aerospace has entered into with the Taiwan Aircraft Corporation in a joint venture for the design, manufacture, marketing and sale of their regional jet aircraft? It does not.

As I anticipate a third partner for British Aerospace in that joint venture, does my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle believe that if that partner does not come from the European Community, that third partner's participation will be affected by whether or not we ratify the Maastricht treaty? Being a close neighbour to my constituency, I am sure he will reply that it will have no bearing whatever.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman referred to our shrinking manufacturing base. He will be aware of industries which utilise wide-ranging skills. For them, we are almost at the point of no return. For example, P & O recently ordered two cruise liners, not from a United Kingdom yard but from German and Italian yards. Not one British merchant yard bid for those two lucrative contracts. The European Commission is denying our warship yards the right to bid competitively for such merchant contracts, and I fear that, within 10 years, we may not possess the skills to enable us to build such advanced vessels.

[Dr. Godman]

Mr. Winterton: The hon. Gentleman has drawn that and similar matters to the attention of hon. Members on previous occasions. He raises a valid and important point. Sadly, the Government—this applies to Governments of both parties—have sold our manufacturing base short and have failed to support it in various forums. The sort of matter which the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow has drawn to my attention is valid because, once that skill has left our shores, it will never be replaced. As the hon. Gentleman is from that part of the country, he knows that that skill has been a huge earner of money for the United Kingdom and a huge employer of labour in the past.

Mr. Cash: I do not wish in any way to preempt anything that my hon. Friend may say in his excellent speech. I refer to the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors and, indeed, the Federation of Small Businesses. The Federation of Small Businesses has not been mentioned in this debate—I addressed its annual conference in Bournemouth recently. About 60,000 members have endorsed the call that I and many others have made for a referendum. Does my hon. Friend agree that the absolutely extraordinary report of the Confederation of British Industry demonstrates that there are no substantial grounds whatever for these continual smears and allegations that failure to ratify the Maastricht treaty will affect inward investment into the United Kingdom in any material way?

The Confederation of British Industry sent the report to Members of Parliament and peers. The report gave a totally misleading impression, which is remarkable. Does my hon. Friend agree that the report sets out what will happen if we do not ratify the Maastricht treaty? For example, a major computer manufacturer in the United States says:

"A United Kingdom decision to stay out of the ERM would not affect our decision on United Kingdom investment. In so far as possible, UK policies on Maastricht, a two-tier Europe and withdrawal from the EC and investment decisions would not be affected."

That is typical.

Mr. Winterton: I am happy to answer by saying yes and yes to my hon. Friend's questions. I believe that the Confederation of British Industry received a nod and a wink and that the specific briefing document was sent out at the request of certain political friends, who may have been in Government. Subsequent to the issue of the report, many members of the CBI have said that they do not agree with many of the comments in it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has anticipated another area to which I wish to refer—Maastricht and the single market. That is important with regard to our economic policy and has a direct bearing on the Government's deficit. It is not said often enough or forcefully enough that Maastricht has next to nothing to do with the single market.

At one time, we were repeatedly told that the single market could not come into force unless the treaty was ratified. Maastricht has not been ratified, and the single market has been with us since 1 January. The single market has been with us since 1 January, even though—dare I say it—Germany has not ratified the treaty because of a technicality. I am not sure when Germany will ratify the treaty. The point that we will remain in the single market even if we do not ratify the treaty should be made time and again to our trading partners, especially those outside the European Community.

I suspect that those well-informed gentlemen in the top echelons of Centrepoint—I refer to the CBI—have deliberately misunderstood this, believing that the single market will collapse and our membership of the single market will end if we do not ratify the treaty.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: My hon. Friend is making a most impressive speech, and is using some material which is obviously well informed. He made the point before about British business men. They believe that signing up for Maastricht will save their businesses. They believe, because they have been told it and they have not read the treaty and do not understand anything about what it means, that they would have to leave the Common Market if the treaty was not ratified. They are told that time and time again.

I was in Copenhagan last week. People there who said no in the referendum because they believed that it was not in the interests of Denmark to sign up to Maastricht are now being told left, right and centre that, if the treaty is not ratified, they will be out of the European Economic Community and all their businesses will collapse. Whoever one asks says exactly the same thing—that they will be left out of Europe if they do not sign up. Something has to be done to bring an element of honesty back into government and business so that that particular myth is killed.

My hon. Friend may be coming shortly to the views of the chief executive of Jardine Matheson, who wrote a letter to the The Times and telephoned around leading business men. He found that most of them believed that the future was not in the signing of Maastricht.

Mr. Winterton: Representations have been made to me by Jardine Matheson, but as my hon. and learned Friend has given the information to the House, I know that you would say that I was being repetitive, Mr. Lofthouse, if I repeated it to the Committee. My hon. and learned Friend's request for honesty should be answered by the Government and the CBI and all the other organisations which have peddled inaccurate and biased information, for whatever reason.

Before I come to the next issue, I return to the Budget. Again, it is relevant to economic policy and the deficit. The deficit is particularly relevant to the matter that I wish to raise. The Government have decided to extend value added tax to heat and light. I wonder why they chose to do that. Was it to reduce the deficit? That was the explanation provided by the Chancellor and other Ministers. Perhaps, Mr. Lofthouse, you will say that I am being too suspicious. Perhaps I am not trusting enough of my colleagues on the Treasury Bench. Did they extend VAT to bring the tax structure and the base of value added tax in Britain more in line with the rest of the EC?

I wonder what further measures my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will announce to the House in the years that lie ahead. He has extended VAT to heat and light. I did not support that, and I will not support it unless he provides certain assurances to me that the vulnerable groups, whom we all know about, are fully and adequately covered.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I can think of better things to do at 4 o'clock in the morning. I would not mind if we were discussing what is before the Committee, but in the past half hour I have heard a broad onslaught on the treaty of Rome, the Single European Act and the general wickedness of the European Community. It is not possible for you to bring the speeches into order, Mr. Lofthouse, so that they deal with the Maastricht treaty and nothing else?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. That is a matter for the Chair. However, on occasions my patience has become somewhat exhausted because the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has ventured into industrial policy, whereas the amendments deal with economic policy. If the hon. Gentleman would bear that in mind, I would be extremely grateful.

Mr. Winterton: Of course I fully accept the view that you have just expressed, Mr. Lofthouse, and as a member of the Chairmen's Panel I accept without question the ruling of the occupant of the Chair. You have always been impeccably fair whenever I have taken part in any debate in the Chamber. However, if industrial policy and the importance of manufacturing are not inextricably entwined with economic policy, I do not know——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. As the hon. Gentleman is fully aware, there has been a separate debate on industrial policy.

4 am

Mr. Winterton: Sadly, on that occasion I did not succeed in catching your eye because, yet again, the Government sought to short-circuit debate in the House on a vital constitutional issue and I was unable to make a speech. I do not wish to get out of order, Mr. Lofthouse, or to tempt you to rise to your feet again, but the issues that I have touched upon are relevant to economic policies and deficits.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) doubts my reference to value added tax on heat and light, he will know that the Chancellor apparently introduced that policy to reduce the Government deficit. He may have done it partly for that reason, but I am suspicious that he has done it to bring the base of taxation in Britain closer to that of the European Community and I am strongly opposed to that.

Once again, I am referring to the deficit and my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South is tempting me, provoking me and forcing me to go further. Having introduced that measure, we are putting a number of vulnerable groups into grave financial difficulty. As a result, the Government will have further to increase the deficit in order to increase the pension and raise by the appropriate amount state income-related benefits and income support.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is not my hon. Friend saying that the redeeming feature was that it was our Chancellor who took the decision to adjust the deficit or do whatever he wished with it? The amendments are about whether or not the House, the Chancellor or any future Chancellor will have the opportunity to do just that. That is what the debate is all about.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend is correct in that we wish the House to have the authority to decide economic policy in all the areas that I said would be handed over to the European central bank, for example, if the Maastricht treaty is ratified, and inevitably other measures that are in the pipeline would follow.

Let me now move on to Maastricht—[Interruption.] Perhaps my hon. Friends are inexperienced in theatrical delivery and did not take account of the pause. I was about to move on to Maastricht and inward investment, which is closely tied up with economic policy.

Inward investment into Britain comes from a number of sources such as the United States and Japan. As my hon. Friend the Minister is inclined to talk, lecture and ram down our throats in economic and other debates in the House, we have been an extremely successful recipient of inward investment. This has been a notable ingredient of our economic success, particularly during the 1980s.

I would like to give a number of reasons for that investment. I pay tribute to the United Kingdom Government, a Conservative Government, for their sympathetic and positive attitude to inward investment. Also, dare I say it—and in no way seeking to upset the nationalists, who are not here, although we have with us the president of the Liberal Democrat party—the English language is one of the reasons why we get inward investment. English is especially important for the Japanese whose second language it is. Another reason is the culture of this country.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: My hon. Friend and the Committee might like to know that two weeks ago I asked a Japanese ambassador if our not signing Maastricht would mean the withdrawal of the Japanese investment in Toyota, which is just outside my constituency. He said that, provided that not signing Maastricht did not mean that Britain would come out of the European Community, there would certainly be no withdrawal of investment, thereby making two points. The first was that their investment is in Britain because we are in the European Community. The second and sinister point, which links up to the point that I made when last I intervened in my hon. Friend's speech, was that there is still the idea going round that if we do not sign Maastricht we will be out of the European Community. That idea must be killed.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. and learned Friend makes the point extremely well, so much so that if ever I need a lawyer he will certainly be my man because he expresses the case so positively, so forcefully and so accurately.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Perhaps I can endorse what has just been said, in alignment with my hon. Friend's own speech. Mr. George, the incoming Governor of the Bank of England, is reported as follows in the Financial Times of 3 March 1993:

"He told a seminar organised by British Invisibles, the export promotion body for services, that the City's position depended on the completion of the single market rather than monetary integration."

That, I think, is conclusive.

Mr. Winterton: I can only say that I am eternally grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet), whose knowledge of industry and certain sectors important to our economy is well respected. The point that he has made is a good one—and far be it from me to argue with the future Governor of the Bank of England. I entirely endorse the view that he has expressed.

Another reason why this country is so attractive for inward investment—I pay tribute to many hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, not necessarily on the Government Benches—is that we have a highly trained and highly productive work force. Given the opportunity to work, they work, and work very well. I suspect that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) may seek to intervene again because I have had this out of the mouths of business men from Japan. They believe that our work force are even better than their work force, and they are very happy to come here for that reason. They are skilled, they are hard-working, they are committed——

Mr. Day: And released from the shackles of socialism.

Mr. Winterton: I will not enter into a party political debate, even though I am tempted to do so, because on this I am sure that I carry both sides of the Committee with me.

Again, they want to come to this country because of our strategic position and because we have a relatively good and improving infrastructure and communications.

I make this challenge on economic policy: think of the improvements created for industry and industrial efficiency, if only the Government would spend the £3 billion that we contribute to the European Community on this country's infrastructure. Think how many tens of thousands, or perhaps hundreds of thousands, it would put back to work, especially in the hard-pressed construction and allied industries.

Our membership of the European Community and the single market is important, but the ratification of Maastricht is of no importance.

Mr. Barry Porter: What are we doing here then?

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend is tempting me again. What is the Committee doing spending so much time on this confounded, irrelevant and unnecessary debate on the Maastricht treaty and the Eruopean Communities (Amendment) Bill? He also has the good sense to come from the north-west of England, albeit from the other side of what was the county of Cheshire, on the Wirral, and if only he would make the strong representations to the Government that I have suggested, perhaps this whole charade and farce would be brought to an end.

For all the reasons that I have described, the United Kingdom is recognised as a centre for inward investment by the Japanese. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton referred to the huge investment by Toyota close to his constituency.

Dr. Godman rose——

Mr. Winterton: Yet again, I am happy to give way to an informed Opposition Member.

Dr. Godman: The Japanese are not the only investors who are ready to acknowledge the high qualities displayed by our work forces. I met senior directors of IBM recently, in the immediate aftermath of the bad news that they recently had to announce. They assured me that the plant at Spango valley in Greenock was among the best in IBM worldwide, and that it would always receive the support of the headquarters in America. They spoke very highly of the work force on the lower Clyde.

Mr. Winterton: The hon. Gentleman never misses an opportunity to advance the interests of his constituency and the interests and success of Scotland, which is such a vital part of the United Kingdom. I can only entirely agree with him.

Mr. Bill Walker: IBM had been in Scotland for a long time.

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) agrees with the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow.

For all the reasons that I have given, the United Kingdom is recognised by the Japanese as a free-trading nation, with a distinguished and long tradition and an open attitude to world trade, which is epitomised by the City of London. For that reason, one is so saddened that the City has joined—for whatever reasons—the disinformation about business being almost entirely in favour of the ratification of the Maastricht treaty.

Our country attracts inward investment, but the same is not true of our major European Community partners, in particular France and Germany, for reasons that are well known to Conservative Members. It is unlikely, however, that inward investment will return in the immediate future to the levels of the 1980s, which were a build-up from a very low base of inward investment.

Japan is a very powerful country. Bearing in mind the strictures of my hon. Friend the Minister in the previous debate—if you will allow me about 15 seconds, Mr. Lofthouse—about the importance of an independent bank, the most economically successful country in the world has been, and still is, Japan, which has a central bank—the Bank of Japan—which is extremely dependent. It is not independent but extremely accountable to the Japanese Government. All the nonsense that Ministers talk about the vital role of an independent European central bank is similar to much of what they say.

Sadly, the Japanese now have a shortage of capital, and that is likely to continue for some time. They have had to withdraw some of their overseas investments and to cut back their banking and securities operations. Indeed, even those in the United Kingdom have had to be reduced. However, Japan is still a major investor in this country. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton has said, it has absolutely no intention of withdrawing its huge investment. Indeed, that investment will be added to. The only stipulated important criterion is that the United Kingdom should stay in the European Community. No Conservative Member suggests for one moment that we should come out.

Sir Teddy Taylor: What?

4.15 am

Mr. Winterton: I have never been able to speak with confidence on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, although one of his luncheon clubs, at his suggestion, has asked me to speak in his constituency. I am very happy to have accepted the invitation, and I look forward to visiting Southend, East, where I know I shall come across a very large number of people who believe that Maastricht is a total waste of time and should be shelved for good—if not, as some of my hon. Friends might say, just for the foreseeable future.

Sir Teddy Taylor: We want a credible case for staying in the EC. No such argument has been heard by the people to whom my hon. Friend refers. What we are facing up to now is nonsense, and what has happened under the Single European Act and the treaty of Rome has turned out to be a disaster for Britain and for democracy.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. This group of amendments is not about coming out of the EC.

Mr. Winterton: Nor is it about going to speak in Southend, East, but I wanted to mention that visit in passing.

The fact that these amendments are not about coming out of the EC is important from the point of view of reassuring those countries that make considerable and important investments in the United Kingdom. Neither the United States nor Japan, despite their domestic difficulties, has withdrawn manufacturing businesses from this country. I only wish that our Government had as positive an attitude towards manufacturing as have many overseas investors. It is unlikely that either the United States or Japan will ever remove any manufacturing capacity from the United Kingdom. The very good reason, which will appeal to Conservative Members and—I say to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) —to Opposition Members, I believe, is that their businesses here are highly profitable. Professor Williams' report to the CBI confirms this: most of the investment has already been made, and substantial follow-on investment from Japan is still to come but may be delayed because of the financial squeeze in that country.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that part of the deficit problem that the United Kingdom faces is accounted for by the fact that, for decades, we have been reducing substantially our ability to generate sufficient wealth to meet the expenditure that the Government have undertaken and added to? This situation has been brought about in part by the fact that the Japanese have been able to sell to the United Kingdom goods worth more than £7,000 million, whereas, as the most recent figures show, we sell goods worth just over £2,000 million to Japan. The Japanese have been able to penetrate the United Kingdom market and the market in the rest of the European Community. Thus Japan, which is not a member of the Community, has improved its deficit situation.

Mr. Winterton: I can only say that my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North makes an interesting and valid point. He has said that the Japanese are prepared to invest here because of the huge market to which that gives them access—perhaps the European Community has not had as much access to the Japanese market as the Japanese have had to the European market. It is to this country that the Japanese have wanted to come to locate their manufacturing.

The report of Professor Williams to the CBI continues in a manner that is relevant to our debate. It states:

"Only a small number would see this"— the non-ratification of the Maastricht treaty—

"as having any major effect on their investment"—

those that come to this country with inward investment——

"provided it did not lead to withdrawal or exclusion from the single market."

It is for that reason that I have grave concerns about the briefing document put out by the CBI to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford referred.

The argument so often advanced by Ministers of a two-speed Europe that will be to the disadvantage of the United Kingdom as we would no longer be at the heart of Europe is specious. Under the second and third stages to the run-up to the European central bank—the heart of Maastricht—countries will be able to unify their economies completely only when they have satisfied four convergent criteria. The latest date for the start of the European central bank is 1999, but it could start with only two member states as its members.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I appreciate that the debate is not about coming out of the Common Market, but does my hon. Friend accept that there is no single EEC country with a higher standard of living per capita income than any single country of the European Free Trade Association, including Austria and Finland—except Luxembourg? Does not that show that there is some sort of life to be had on the margins of Europe?

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend is correct to draw the Committee's attention to the fact that being a member of Europe is not necessarily a recipe for a successful and good-quality life. However, the currency and economy of Austria are quite closely linked to the deutschmark. I say that as one who has a skiing holiday there every year, as well as many friends there—we have a home quite close to the German border. Perhaps the Austrians gain some benefit from their German bedfellow—the German republic. My hon. Friend made a valid point in respect of the other EFTA countries, not least Sweden—although, like most other countries, Sweden currently has an economic problem.

It could be that, initially, only two member states will be members of the European central bank. It is likely that, thereafter, for a time there may be five, then there could be seven or 10. We could have a five-speed Europe, a seven-speed Europe or a 10-speed Europe. Therefore, to talk about a two-speed Europe is specious and dishonest.

The United Kingdom cannot be excluded from the single market or any decision about the future of the single market. Whatever happens to Maastricht, our participation in, and membership of, the single market—and that of our partners in Europe and the single market—is a matter of international law. To say that we could be damaged and that our membership of the Community and our involvement in the single market would be affected is nonsense.

Secondly, after Germany, we are the largest single contributor to the EC budget. I fully support the expansion of the European Community—if it was merely a trading unit and a free trade area, which is what most of our people voted for in the early 1970s. I note that the Opposition's main spokesman in the debate, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), nods in assent. He believes what I believe, that a majority of our people thought that that was what they were voting for in the 1975 referendum. I am surprised that the Opposition are not now in favour of a referendum, because when they were in government they passed legislation for the 1975 referendum. The people of this country know rather more than the Government are prepared to give them credit for, although at that time they thought that they were joining a trading partnership. However, there was far more to it in the small print of the treaty of Rome.

I have said that we are the second largest contributor to the EC budget. We are also running a massive trade deficit with our EC partners. I have made many speeches all over the country outlining my reasons for opposing the Maastricht treaty and any further step along the path to a federal, centralist state. I repeat what I said in those speeches: that the countries of mainland Europe need us far more than we need them, for the financial reasons that I have spelt out.

Mr. Day: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Winterton: I am happy to give way once more before I sit down.

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend said why he thinks that the Maastricht treaty is a threat, especially to industry. He also said that he was totally opposed to a centralised, bureaucratic Europe, as are most hon. Members and certainly Conservative Members. Why does he think that Europe has developed in that way? Why is Britain reactive rather than proactive? Could it be because Britain has never been positive about its membership of Europe and gives the impression of having one foot in and one foot out? Some of my hon. Friends give the impression that they do not want to have even one foot in.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are departing from the subject of the debate, which is economic policy.

Mr. Winterton: I hope that you will not blame me, Mr. Lofthouse, for my hon. Friend's intervention. That would be unfair and I have the greatest admiration for you in the Chair. My hon. Friend tempts me to say that I would rather have one foot in the grave than two. Some people, and especially the members of the Government, wish that I had both feet in the grave, but they will have to do better than they have been doing so far to bring that about. You have been extremely patient, Mr. Lofthouse, and tolerant of my brief contribution to the debate on these important amendments.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that we will remain at the heart of Europe. Even without Maastricht, Europe wants us and our influence is greatly appreciated. Wherever I have travelled in Europe as a holidaymaker rather than as a Member of Parliament or with Select Committees or other groups, I have found that the people of the country that we are visiting are always immensely impressed by the United Kingdom and its parliamentary system. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle not believe that this country's culture is slightly different from those of France, Germany, Belgium and Holland?

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Of course it is.

Mr. Winterton: For that reason——

The Chairman: Order. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have had a debate on culture.

Mr. Winterton: You, Mr. Lofthouse, were of course right to call me to order.

The United Kingdom has a unique, positive and responsible contribution to make to the European Community. We have done so and can continue to do so —and we do not need the Maastricht treaty to enable us to do it.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I have been sitting in the Chamber since 9.30 pm, and it occurs to me that the central heating has been switched off, because it is very cold. I wonder whether the temperature is below a tolerable level. It has certainly cooled down quite dramatically—which is purely coincidental with the forceful and brilliant speech of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) lasting upwards of an hour.

The First Deputy Chairman: I noticed that some heat had been generated over the past couple of hours, but as to the temperature in the Chamber, those responsible will no doubt have taken note.

4.30 am

Mr. Winnick: It is scandalous that we should be debating these matters at 4.30 am. There was no justification for the Government to proceed after 10 o'clock, and they could not have carried the business motion without the support of the Liberal Democrats. The Jopling report, which will be debated in due course, argues that the House should rarely sit later than 10 pm.

To debate these vital constitutional questions, whether one is for or against them, in the early hours of the morning is quite wrong. It makes a mockery of the Government's commitment to proper and adequate debate. Clearly, they want—so far as they are able—to get most of the economic issues out of the way. I have registered my protest.

The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) gave us an overview of the amendments and new clauses under consideration. I say straight away that I am not in favour of the Maastricht treaty. I will remain in order and address immediately article 104c and related matters, but I do not want to give the impression that, if it were not for article 104c, I would favour the treaty. I am against it. I am against the transfer of sovereignty in such a way.

I am not in favour of Britain leaving the European Community, whatever the pros and cons. After 20 years of membership, I think that it has become accepted that there would be many more problems and headaches in leaving the Community than remaining in it. Since the 1975 referendum, I have never argued that we should leave it. There is no question in my mind but that we should remain a member of the Community.

Dr. Godman: Does my hon. Friend agree that, whether one is pro-Community or a critic of it, because there is no promise of a referendum, each and every right hon. and hon. Member owes it to his or her constituents to scrutinise the Bill in as tough-minded and rigorous a way as possible? Surely that is the case.

Mr. Winnick: That is certainly the case. I live in the real world, and I am under no illusion but that the Government will get their way one way or another and that the Bill will be passed in due course. However, the problem will not go away for the Government, or even for my party. Given that there is such a division of opinion and dissatisfaction in the country, the treaty will remain an issue of great controversy. It is sheer nonsense to imagine that it will no longer remain so once Parliament approves the Bill. The debate will continue. I certainly will not change my mind as a result of the Bill's passage; it would be very odd if I did.

I have said that I would remain opposed to the treaty even without article 104c, but I am even more opposed to the deflationary flavour that characterises so much of it —and, in particular, characterises the article, the clauses and the amendments that we are now discussing. I hope that every hon. Member—not just those who are present now—will read article 104c, if they have not already done so. It uses two and a quarter columns to set out the way in which member states should avoid excessive Government deficits, and goes on to explain the procedures that will be involved when a member state is considered to have exceeded the permitted deficit. We know the related protocol, which clearly states that the deficit should be no more than 3 per cent. of GDP.

Earlier, I asked the Library to check the present position. The Library responded in the efficient and courteous way in which it usually deals with Members' queries. I am informed that a United Kingdom deficit of 8·2 per cent. is forecast for 1993. Achieving the convergence required by the 3 per cent. figure would require a £33 billion cut in public spending, unless taxes were increased.

Unlike some Conservative Members, I have little confidence in the Government's commitment to public spending. Over the years, they have carried out a number of cuts with which Opposition Members have strongly disagreed. But if there was ever an incentive for a Conservative Government with no great love of public expenditure to make further reductions in basic services, surely it is article 104c of the Maastricht treaty. Let me point out to Opposition Front Benchers in particular that, however critical we were of the Government's cuts in public spending, as long as convergence was being secured the Government would have an alibi.

It is not just a question of when the treaty will come into force. The emphasis will be on trying to achieve economic convergence before it comes into force, and before the third stage. That is part of the emphasis in article 104c. It does not merely refer to economic and monetary union as such; measures will need to be taken, and member states will be encouraged to take those measures before the third stage is reached, whether or not the United Kingdom decides to go ahead with EMU in 1996.

I know that those on the Opposition Front Bench will say, "We are not committed to the 3 per cent. figure." That may well be so, and I shall listen carefully to what my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) has to say; but the treaty is the treaty, and no remarks from either Front Bench can change its nature. Article 104c directly contradicts all that the labour movement has fought and campaigned for ever since it came into existence, and I find it inconceivable that we could support a treaty that contains such an article. It is of course true that, if a member state exceeds the 3 per cent. limit, there is no immediate fine or punishment. It is not part of my case that stern disciplinary measures will be taken at once if a member state goes over the limit. I concede that point, but article 104c outlines the steps that will be taken to ensure that a member state is kept in line.

The requirements will mean that a member state must go to the Commission and the Council and explain precisely what is being done to reduce the deficit. That is a very humiliating experience for an independent country. If we believe that certain measures are necessary in our overall interest, but the Commission decides that they are creating a deficit above the permitted level, we shall have to explain our position. Do those who support the treaty believe that we should have to do that?

When we have a Labour Government, do we want Labour Ministers to go first to the Commission and then to the Council of Ministers to explain, as far as they can, why the deficit has gone above the permitted limit and what action is to be taken? Is that the role of an independent country? Those who argue that the treaty is not as bad as we paint it must explain how and why they support such a measure.

Mr. Betts: I do not understand why such a scenario should concern my hon. Friend. Is he objecting to countries in the European Community trying to work together on economic policy and to one country discussing with others why it is pursuing certain policies, what its objectives are and how they match those of the whole Community? I see nothing wrong with such a process.

Mr. Winnick: I should have been surprised by my hon. Friend's response even if the proposal were not so deflationary. Why should we have to defend and justify our position in the way he outlined? Why should a country which has retained its independence for so many centuries have to virtually grovel and explain why it was necessary to exceed the permitted limit? Have we reached a stage where the practices and policies of the other member states are so superior to ours, and our practices of parliamentary government and democracy so inferior, that we have to do what my hon. Friend suggests?

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, basically, we are being put through this humiliating and absurd procedure because it is within the framework of what is intended to be a united states of Europe? Are not people literally deceiving themselves and the British public continuously, in the belief that we shall somehow gain some advantage from the miserable negotiation that led to the pathetic treaty? The European People's party, to which my party is now apparently married, is the prime advocate of a united states of Europe. That is the truth of what is happening.

Mr. Winnick: I entirely agree, and no one should think otherwise. The other countries involved in the negotiations found it odd that the British dislike the word "federal", so they decided to humour us by leaving it out. Anyone who believes that the process is not leading to a federal Europe lives in a dream world. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I would have more respect for those who are in favour of the treaty if they would say so openly. However much I disagree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), he at least knows where he stands. He is for a federal Europe.

The right hon. Gentleman supports the article because he believes that it is a necessary ingredient in securing the sort of federal arrangements that he wants. Indeed, when he was challenged by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) to say whether a single currency would mean a single Government, the right hon. Gentleman nodded. He was perfectly happy with that idea. He would argue that he is a deeply patriotic individual, and I have no reason to say otherwise; we all know about his military service during the war. He believes that the treaty is the best way in which Britain's role in Europe can be set. But I fundamentally disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. I do not want us to be part and parcel of a federal Europe. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) could not be more right; all the preconditions are there for the road that will ultimately be taken.

4.45 am

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend said that a country, a member state, could be forced to grovel at a meeting of the Council. May I point out to him that it is not a country but a Government that would be in that position. If a Government are criticised and censured in public during an election year, the Council's intervention could have a decisive effect on the outcome of the election. The Council could play an important role in censuring Governments in public under article 104c(8), especially in an election year. The Council is an extremely exclusive club; is that criticism likely to be administered during an election year?

Mr. Winnick: It is possible to argue that if, during the 18 months leading up to a general election, a Government decided to adopt certain measures that might help them to be re-elected, and that involved more public spending, what my hon. Friend suggests could happen.

However, when I said that a country could be in a humiliating position, with its Ministers having to grovel, I meant, of course, that those Ministers and that Government would represent the people of this country. I do not believe that there is any mandate for us so to abandon our economic sovereignty in the manner outlined in the articles.

I am working on the assumption that Governments would be reluctant to raise taxation anything like enough to cover a deficit such as the present United Kingdom deficit, and that would mean not less unemployment but more. I have great respect for my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). He and I usually agree, but this is one issue on which we disagree. None the less, I know that my hon. Friend is no less committed than I to trying to end, or at least substantially to reduce, the curse of mass unemployment, I shall refer to my hon. Friend's maiden speech now, and I hope I am not embarrasing him by doing so, because this is the second time that I have mentioned that speech; the other was at a party meeting.

In that speech, my hon. Friend said that he was entering the House at the age of 42—an age at which so many of his constituents were not only unemployed, but had probably given up hope of ever being able to work again. My hon. Friend is fortunate, as we all are, to be able to continue in employment. But if we in the Labour party are not concerned about unemployment, what could we possibly be concerned about? I do not question the commitment of our Front-Bench spokesmen to ending or substantially reducing mass unemployment, but how can we argue with any real conviction in favour of measures to try to reduce unemployment and end the curse affecting so many people in Britain and throughout the European Community while at the same time agreeing to measures that would involve a substantial cut in public spending? I do not understand it.

I have already said that Britain is likely to have a deficit of 8·2 per cent. To get anywhere near the 3 per cent. limit, we should need billions and billions of pounds' less of public spending. That is why I believe that we should be very critical indeed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) argued that, if people have no recourse, as they may not if the treaty is ratified, they may riot. I do not know whether they will riot or not; circumstances differ. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nonsense."] What I do know is that, if the House of Commons loses its authority on such fundamental issues, it will be perfectly understandable if people conclude that voting makes very little difference and that the House of Commons makes little difference.

At the moment, when people are dissatisfied, they write to their Member of Parliament. Of course, they work on the assumption that, especially if their Member of Parliament is an Opposition Member, not much will come of it, but at least they know that we will do our utmost and that, ultimately, if the Government who are in office want to act, they can do so: power resides here in the House of Commons. It will not reside here if the treaty comes into force.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman has been in the House some time. He will have witnessed the feeling among hon. Members on both sides of the House who represent peripheral parts of the United Kingdom, especially Northern Ireland and Scotland, that the House does not fully understand the aspirations of the people in those parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman should consider what implications there would be for the unity of the United Kingdom if those people felt that Parliament had no purpose because it had lost all control of finances. Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that that would not lead to some kind of unrest outside?

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that people already feel that Whitehall, the Government and the rest are rather remote from their ordinary lives. One of the purposes of writing to a Member of Parliament is that that Member of Parliament then writes to the Minister: there is a reply setting the position out in detail, which one sends on to one's constituents. In other cases, of course, one brings the battle to the House.

I do not want to be provoked, but I am rather concerned because my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) said a moment ago from a seated position that I was talking nonsense. If I am talking nonsense and my hon. Friend is disagreeing that such powers will be taken away, perhaps my hon. Friend would care to intervene and explain why he thinks I am talking nonsense. Has he read article 104c? Why does he conclude that my thesis—that the House and therefore the country would lose tremendous economic power that would be transferred elsewhere—is wrong?

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): The utter nonsense to which I was referring was the suggestion that there would be riots in the street over Maastricht. I have no evidence of that, and neither has anyone else in the Committee. That is the utter nonsense to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Winnick: I am glad that I provoked my hon. Friend into intervening. He misunderstood me. [Interruption.] I do not know what sarcastic comment my hon. Friend wishes to make, but perhaps he will be courteous enough to listen to my reply. I hope that we can conduct this debate in a courteous manner. I have respect for my hon. Friend, as I had respect for his predecessor, with whom I also sometimes disagreed.

It is not part of my argument that people will riot over what we are debating, and if I did not make my position clear, I apologise. I am simply saying—my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield said it with greater emphasis—that, if the treaty comes into force and power is transferred, as it will be, and people find that the House of Commons cannot deal with issues, a certain situation may arise. We must consider what view people will take if there is much concern over mass unemployment and so on. I do not want rioting to occur.

I have always defended some of the scenes that take place in this Chamber. People often ask why there is so much noise at Prime Minister's Question Time and on other big occasions. Far better, I say, that the outlet for the noise should be here than on the streets. When there is controversy—over, say, the poll tax—the divide is great, there will be scenes that some people do not like but which do not bother me. But I assure my hon. Friend that I am not suggesting that people are rioting or even that they are writing letters about what we are debating. I am pleased to have resolved any misunderstanding that may have existed.

Mr. Cash: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that we could be in grave danger of underestimating the consequences of what might happen if this massive arrangement for convergence were brought into effect? Already people in France are rioting over the lamb question, and there is the fishing situation. Difficulties have arisen in Italy and there are problems in Rostock and Frankfurt. The problems in Russia are getting more worrying, and there is Bosnia, Kosovo and so on.

All will be exacerbated by an implosion of the arrangements for economic and monetary union, which will disintegrate just as the exchange rate mechanism has disintegrated. With voluntary euthanasia by national parliaments and, as the hon. Gentleman says, without any means of redress, people will have no base point to which to refer. They will not be able to vote people out, and they will certainly not be able to turn out the bankers.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we can have more about finance and less about riots.

Mr. Winnick: Rather than pursue a course of action that will not help to resolve the problems of Europe, we should be spending our time, at Community level, dealing with the problems of Europe, inside and outside the European Community.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if people lose the ability to influence matters and decisions close to them, affecting their everyday lives, because of the inability of this place, through its economic policies, to respond to people's aspirations and expectations, then in due course, following the build-up of frustration, the sort of situation to which reference has been made—of people going on to the streets—could occur?

While the hon. Gentleman may not be receiving letters about the treaty, I am receiving at least a dozen a day, 99·9 per cent. in favour of the anti-Maastricht stance that I have taken. They come not just from my constituency but from all parts of Britain.

Mr. Winnick: Those are valid points, which go to the core of the article and the protocol which we are debating. What are the roles and functions of the House of Commons? Certainly, it is an outlet for grievances. It is a way in which constituents can express their concerns and we can echo those concerns, as we do daily at every opportunity.

Above all else, the function of the House of Commons is the supply of money. All the battles which took place for the supremacy of the House of Commons against the sovereign and so on were, to a large extent, involved in that issue. If the treaty goes ahead and steps are taken before the third stage—whether we go for economic convergence or not—what will be the function of the House of Commons? However much we may wish to pursue policies —even if the Government of the day take the view that such policies are desirable—if the Government know that they will go over the spending limit and, in so doing, be brought before the Commission and the Council, it is clear that they must take the view that they cannot do what they may wish to do and what they may consider desirable.

Although we are debating the deficit and so on, the core of the matter is the future of the House of Commons and Parliament. I do not wish to say that the House of Commons will have no functions and will virtually close down if the treaty is ratified. To exaggerate the position would be bad enough.

If the powers to decide how the money is spent, what polices are pursued and so on are removed, what are we left with? Effectively, we will be left with the same powers as those of an existing county council. That would be a great disservice not only to ourselves—after all, we are but the servants of our constituents—but to the people of the United Kingdom who, over centuries, struggled to obtain the sort of parliamentary democracy which we have and which I greatly value. I hope that other hon. Members also value it.

As my remarks were not meant to be lengthy, I shall conclude with two points. Unemployment is perhaps one of the most important and crucial issues at present. The hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) referred to the 1944 White Paper on employment. It is interesting to note the last speech of Lord Merlyn-Rees in the House of Commons, which was excellent. It was one of the best speeches he ever made. Anyone who did not listen to it should read it. He specifically referred to the need to go back to the values of the 1944 White Paper on employment and the emphasis which existed just before the war ended, and said that the curse of pre-war unemployment should not return to the United Kingdom, which it has now done.

If one takes the view that we should return to as near full employment as possible, the remarks of Labour Members and the criticisms of some Conservative Members would be of little value if policies along the lines which we are debating were pursued. Such policies would make it virtually impossible to go back to what was intended in 1944 and what was carried out for some 25 or 30 years.

Therefore, it would be wrong to look on article 104c as a technical, academic matter which is not of great importance and which we are using for mischief. The policies that we want to see to end mass unemployment, provide necessary spending on health and welfare and ensure that the people most in need in our country get their right due are related to this issue.

5 am

The Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), obviously takes a different view. If he is so critical—as I know he is—of mass unemployment, he should recognise that he is defending a policy which would make it so much more difficult, if not impossible, to end the curse of unemployment in Britain.

I regret that we are debating the Bill at this hour. I have mentioned that before, so I shall not repeat it simply because there has been a change of occupant of the Chair. It is disgraceful that such matters should be debated at 5 o'clock in the morning. I hope that I shall not be seen as unduly critical of other hon. Members on both sides of the House—I am not criticising one side in particular—when I say that it is unfortunate that they have not taken a greater interest in the debate.

I know that Labour Members' commitment to the policies about which I have spoken is no less than mine. They have campaigned in their working and political lives no less than I have done. But in so far as they may be sympathetic to Maastricht and all that goes with it, they should recognise that so much of what they want to see done for the British people, will be undermined if the treaty goes ahead.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said in an intervention at the beginning of my speech that the treaty was a substantial step towards a federal Europe. I agreed. It is a step towards a united states of Europe. Those who are in favour of that, including Ministers, have not the honesty openly to declare what they want. In a federal Europe, we would lose even more political and economic independence than we would lose under the Maastricht treaty.

When I look back on my life, I value my working life because I have had the honour and privilege to be a Member of Parliament, however much people disagree with some of my remarks and however much I may cause upset. I hope that it will continue for many years to come. The House of Commons has achieved powers and privileges over the centuries. The House of Commons is the forum of the country. It gives me no pleasure to be in the House of Commons at a time when so much of what we have achieved over the centuries is being undermined by a treaty which I most ardently believe to be against the interests of Britain.

Mr. Dorrell: When he moved his amendment, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) made it clear that this group of amendments dealt with the other side of the coin from the group immediately before. The former group addressed the institutional arrangements that would be necessary for the conduct of monetary policy if there was a single currency in the member states and in Britain.

This group of amendments deals with the arrangements for the conduct of fiscal policy in the context of the introduction of a single currency. As I said in the last debate, it follows as night follows day that, if there is a single currency, it is necessary to have a single monetary authority. Therefore, it must follow that the authority is divorced at least to some degree from the member states of the Community.

There is unanimity among Members of all parties that, even if there is a single currency managed by a monetary authority and divorced from the member states, the fiscal side of economic policy making should remain the responsibility of member states.

The purpose of the right hon. Gentleman's amendments is to remove from the treaty the qualifications on the responsibility for fiscal policy which rests on the individual member states. Under the terms of the treaty, the main responsibility for fiscal policy, even at stage 3 of monetary union, rests with the member states. It is, however, a responsibility that is qualified both in article 104c and in the protocol that is supported by the article.

The debate on the effect of the article has proceeded on very much the same basis as the debate on the implications of introducing a single currency. It has been based on a similar leap of logic, because it has tended to concentrate on the implications for sovereignty and for the power of the House of the full effect of article 104c as it would apply if a single currency were introduced and we moved to stage 3.

It is therefore necessary to restate the proposition that Britain has given no commitment to move to stage 3 of economic and monetary union as defined in the treaty. We have given no undertaking to introduce a single currency. The House will have to address another time the question whether we would accept the full force of all the paragraphs of article 104c. It is not a question that we have to address later tonight.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend explain something that so far no Minister has sought to explain or, I believe, can explain? There is another protocol immediately adjacent to the stage 3 protocol—I am glad that the Minister is looking it up as I shall quote parts of it verbatim—that states that we shall not exercise the veto in respect of other member states' movement towards stage 3, that it will be irreversible and irrevocable and that we, as a member state, have agreed to it.

Does my hon. Friend agree that if we have agreed that we will be at the heart of Europe but that we will not prevent other member states from going ahead with stage 3 we are locking ourselves into an arrangement that necessarily presumes that we will go down that route? The decision that the protocol refers to as our so-called opt-out is no more than a fig leaf. It is a clever fig leaf, but it will not kid us.

Mr. Dorrell: I do not accept my hon. Friend's proposition. He seems to be confusing a treaty obligation set out in a protocol not to obstruct the development of monetary union on the part of other member states with a rhetorical flourish used by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to describe his frame of mind in approaching European policy. The frame of mind of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is of considerable interest and importance to me and, I would hope, to my hon. Friend, but it does not constitute a treaty obligation.

The treaty obligations are set out in the document to which my hon. Friend and I have access, and the protocol on the United Kingdom set out on pages 114-15 of the treaty states clearly:

"The United Kingdom shall notify the Council whether it intends to move to the third stage".

It also sets out clearly in the context of that protocol what the implications would be if we decided not to move to stage 3 of monetary union.

Mr. Cash: The Minister must reply to my point about the protocol of transition to the third stage of economic and monetary union. If, as a member state, we are a high contracting party and, together with the other member states, we declare the irreversible character of the Community's movement to the third stage of economic and monetary union stating that it is irreversible and irrevocable, surely my hon. Friend is bound to admit that we as a member state have said that we would go down that route.

Mr. Dorrell: With respect to my hon. Friend, that is a rather different point. He was quoting the phrase that our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has used about his desire to pursue a policy based on the proposition that we should be at the heart of Europe. That is a rhetorical flourish not found anywhere in the treaty.

5.15 am

As regards the question of the irreversible character of the Community's movement to the third stage of economic and monetary union by signing the new treaty provisions on economic and monetary union, the treaty provisions in this document set out a total package, and part of the package is the following protocol on the position of the United Kingdom. The protocol makes it abundantly clear, in words that do not, frankly, require a professional lawyer to interpret them, that the United Kingdom has preserved for itself a freedom to join or not to join a single currency, that decision to be made by the United Kingdom in accordance with arrangements that we make for ourselves and which are set out in the Bill which the Committee is considering.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): I accept what the Minister is saying about stage 3. Strictly speaking, he is saying what is stated in the words of the treaty, and I accept that because I am interested in looking in detail at the words of the treaty. The question that I want to ask him is about stage 2. Are the Government fully committed to implementing——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating. He specifically said that he wished to ask a question about stage 2, and the next debate is about stages 2 and 3. I imagined that he would be trying to catch my eye in the next debate. Perhaps he would like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Chisholm: I am talking about budget deficits because in stage 2 there is an undertaking to get budget deficits down, and most of article 104c actually refers to stage 2. Are the Government committed to all the parts of article 104c, apart from paragraphs 1, 9 and 11? A related question would be about the exchange rate fluctuation: are the Government committed to getting back into the ERM at the narrow bands in stage 2? That is what I am interested in.

Mr. Dorrell: The question about exchange rate fluctuations is a question on convergence criteria and the effect of convergence, which really arises in the next group of amendments. As regards the hon. Gentleman's straight question—whether we acknowledge that article 104c, with the exception of paragraphs 1, 9 and 11, applies to us in the course of the stage 2—the answer is that we do accept it. Article 104c.1 is substituted in stage 2 by the provision in article 109e.4, which is that, during the second stage of the progress to economic and monetary union as defined by the treaty,

> "Member States shall endeavour to avoid excessive government deficits."

The introduction of the word "endeavour" makes the obligation at stage 2 significantly different from the obligation in stage 3.

I want to describe percisely our obligations in stage 2. There is a lead obligation to endeavour to avoid excessive budgets deficits and during stage 2, as the hon. Gentleman quite rightly pointed out, the teeth, when it comes to making the obligations in article 104c compulsorily applicable, are drawn, because the teeth of article 104c are to be found in paragraphs 9 and 11 of the article. The other paragraphs of the article interpret the meaning of the phrase "excessive government deficits", and the obligation that we accept in stage 2 of the progress to economic and monetary union, as defined by the treaty, is an obligation to endeavour to avoid those deficits.

Mr. Winnick: As the Minister states, the appropriate paragraph reads

> "Member States shall endeavour to avoid excessive government deficits" in the transitional stage.

Is it the Government's wish, as far as possible, to bring the deficit to 3 per cent. in the period between ratification of the treaty and 1996? If so, what are the implications for public expenditure cuts?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall discuss the impact of the reference values in a moment. Government policy is in line with the treaty obligation which we wish the House to bless and which we wish to sign up to—to endeavour to avoid excessive budget deficits. I will describe how the reference values inform that commitment.

Sir Teddy Taylor: So that we may know exactly what Government policy is, if the Council makes a recommendation under paragraph 7 of article 104c, naming a time limit, would the Government endeavour to seek to achieve that budget deficit within the given time? It is important for people to know the Government's intention. We accept that they are not legally bound by paragraphs 9 and 11, but if the Council recommended that Britain do something specific with the budget deficit within a specified time, would the Government seek to achieve it? It would be helpful if the Minister were to answer that question.

Mr. Dorrell: If the Government found themselves in receipt of an opinion issued under paragraph 7, we would seek to avoid excessive budget deficits, not primarily because of the opinion received under the paragraph but because we think that the policy commitment is sensible in its own terms, for reasons that I shall describe. I will return to that theme because it is relevant to discussion of the treaty of Maastricht and to the great majority of what a Treasury Minister spends his life doing.

I do not accept the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) that a choice must be made between the delivery of social objectives and the avoidance of excessive budget deficits. The two propositions go hand in hand and, for reasons outwith the treaty of Maastricht, it is Government policy to seek to avoid excessive budget deficits.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am aware that my hon. Friend has certain business experience. He has just mentioned his responsibilities at the Treasury, but may I direct my question to him as a business man? Can he not foresee a number of occasions when a business and perhaps the Government, of which he is a member, might need a budget deficit in excess of the 3 per cent. of gross domestic product specified in the treaty and the Bill; but find that they are restricted? We might rightly need that deficit for a good purpose.

Mr. Dorrell: Yes, I can envisage such circumstances, for example, in 1993-94 when we shall want to be in excess of the reference level values. To suggest that there is some automatic level beyond which we cannot under any circumstances go is a misrepresentation of the treaty, and I will deal with that when I discuss the effect of reference values within it.

In stage 2, we undertake the commitment to endeavour to avoid excessive budget deficits. We are not subject to sanctions in the forms provided for in paragraphs 9 and 11 and, therefore, it is true to say that we have accepted a treaty obligation which, to some extent, diminishes our national responsibility for fiscal policy. None the less, it remains true that responsibility for fiscal policy rests with the member state and, furthermore, in the exercise of that responsibility, the state or the United Kingdom Government and institutions cannot be liable to any sanction arising from the treaty.

If, as a matter of political choice, within the terms of the treaty and of the Bill, the Government, with the consent of the House of Commons by way of an Act of Parliament, as is provided for in the Bill, were to decide to move to the third stage of economic and monetary union, the nature of the obligations taken on with regard to excessive budget deficits would, of course, change. If we go down this road —the issue is obviously one that the House of Commons will consider when deciding whether to do so—our treaty obligation will change. It will cease to be an obligation to endeavour to avoid excessive budget deficits—as a former Whip, I am very familiar with the words "best endeavours"—and will become an obligation, set out in paragraph 1 of article 104c, to avoid excessive deficits. Furthermore, the sanctions provided for in paragraphs 9 and 11 will apply to the United Kingdom.

There is no denying that that is a clear limit, defined by the treaty, on the proposition that fiscal policy will remain the responsibility of member states. In a moment, I will explore the precise nature of that limit, but it clearly is a limit defined in a treaty. I do not, however, accept for one moment the development of that proposition put forward by hon. Members who say that because the national responsibility of member states for fiscal policy is qualified, there is no meaningful responsibility left with the member states. There is a qualification, but it is not true to say that responsibility has shifted. The qualification is defined by treaty, under which responsibility clearly remains with the member states.

Dr. Godman: May we take it that, while some of the United Kingdom's immunity against the imposition of sanctions by way of paragraph 11 survives, the United Kingdom will not sit in judgment on a state that is being examined because of its failure to adhere to these regulations? Will the United Kingdom take part in the disciplining of another member state when, or if, it loses or gives up its immunity?

Mr. Dorrell: As I said in an earlier intervention, my understanding is that when the Council is reaching decisions about those questions, it meets as the Council of Ministers, and not as any special body, and that all its members, whether or not they are in stage 3, are entitled to participate within the terms of the article. I am sure that if that information is incorrect I shall be appropriately advised so that I may inform the Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is not my hon. Friend accepting that if and when we go to stage 3 the Government of the United Kingdom will be put into a straitjacket—and I mean a straitjacket—as the only possible action, if we perceive a budget deficit beyond the 3 per cent., will be to raise taxation? In fact, the Government will not be able, in stage 3, to do what the Chancellor has done this year. Is this the sort of decision that my hon. Friend believes is right for the country?

Mr. Dorrell: I am about to explore the precise nature of the obligations that we would be assuming. It is the Government's objective to avoid excessive Government deficits—I hope that I share that commitment with my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton).

When he introduced the debate, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney correctly drew attention to the fact that the provisions of article 104c do not provide for automatic application of limits, either to budget deficits or to the relationship between gross Government debt and GDP. The reference values set out in the treaty are not commitments. The treaty's commitment is to avoid an excessive budget deficit.

5.30 am

Article 104c.3 clearly sets out the consequence of a failure to fulfil a reference value. It is not to declare that an individual member state is in default of its treaty obligations. The result of an individual member state's failure to satisfy the reference values is set out in paragraph 3, where it states:

"If a Member State does not fulfil the requirements under one or both of these criteria, the Commission shall prepare a report."

That is the beginning and the end of the precise consequences of failure to satisfy a reference value. The paragraph goes on to discuss the issues that the report prepared by the Commission has to cover if a report is occasioned by the failure of a member state to satisfy the reference criteria.

Ms Abbott: Much has been made of the specific concrete sanctions in article 104c, but long before fines and votes were encountered, would not the very fact that a negative report had been prepared and possibly published lead to the country involved starting to lose access to the capital markets and capital flows? Rather than focusing on the end of the road, would it not be better to focus on the beginning of the road, where a country that was not hitting its deficit targets would be in a position similar to those countries that receive a bad report from the International Monetary Fund? The IMF does not have to impose concrete sanctions; the minute the international capital markets are aware that a country is failing its IMF tests, capital flows, whether from multinational institutions or commercial banks, cease to enter that country. We can harp on about the sanctions to the exclusion of looking at what would happen naturally in the market if a country were perceived to be failing its tests, whether at the second or third stage.

The Chairman: That was a very long intervention.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) makes a good point. The truth is that, whatever the treaty of Maastricht says, the financial markets watch the performance, not merely of member states of the Community, but every member of the United Nations. The criteria set out in the treaty are well known to any operator in the sovereign lending market.

The mistake of so much comment on the treaty obligation is to assume that, merely because the Commission is under an obligation to prepare a report, the Commission will necessarily come to the conclusion that failure to deliver one reference value constitutes an excessive budget deficit. There is no basis for that assumption.

Article 104c.3 makes it clear that, in preparing the report, the Commission has to look at the values that are measured in order to assess reference values—deficits and gross Government debt. But paragraph 3 also states that the Commission must have regard to the relationship between the deficit and Government investment, and it must also have regard—this is the key answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield and to one of the issues raised by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney—to

"the medium term economic and budgetary position of the Member State."

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) got that exactly right. That provision not merely allows but requires the Commission to take account of the trade cycle in assessing whether a member state is running an excessive budget deficit.

The treaty recognises that budget deficits will fluctuate according to the state of the trade cycle. The key criterion is none of this mechanistic stuff but the words "an excessive budget deficit". In assessing that, the Commission and, on the basis of its report, the Council must look at the economic position in which a country finds itself. These are guides and there is nothing automatic about the conclusions to which they lead.

Mr. Chisholm: This matter is at the heart of the debate on budget deficits and it is important to examine article 104c 3. The last two lines of that are central to the reinterpretation of this part of the treaty. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) dealt with Government investment and said that, as it was only 2 per cent. of GDP, it was not very relevant to the argument. The key words in the article are "the medium term economic and budgetary position".

The Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) are interpreting those words in a Keynesian way as if they refer to cycles and mean that sometimes we can have budget deficits and sometimes we cannot. But the thrust of the treaty is anti-Keynesian and does not mean that. It merely says that a year or two will be given to get the budget deficit down to 3 per cent. and then it must be kept there. It is not about Keynesian reflation and troughs and peaks and so on.

Mr. Dorrell: I will later discuss the supposed divide between Keynesians and monetarists. I sometimes wonder which side of that argument Keynes would have been on if he were alive.

I should like to deal with another question posed by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney. He asked whether the decisions of the Council, which are provided for in paragraphs 9 and 11 of article 104c are appealable to any Community institution. They are appealable in the normal way under article 173 of the treaty of Rome, which states:

"The Court of Justice shall review the legality of acts of the Council and the Commission other than recommendations or opinions."

The provisions of paragraphs 9 and 11 are neither opinions nor recommendations and are therefore subject to review on the initiative of the affected member state.

Any hon. Member is legitimately entitled to ask why the provisions for confining the fiscal responsibility of a member state are in the treaty. I hope to give a clear answer to that question. Once again, I must ask the Committee to recognise that the provisions, when they have teeth, apply only in the context of a single-currency system. Those who will not accept under any circumstances a single currency clearly do not have a basis for engaging in the argument, because to be against a single currency means that one is against all the paraphernalia that goes with it. The provisions are part of that paraphernalia.

In the context of a single currency in the member states, every member state has a clear interest in avoiding excessive official borrowing because that would influence financial conditions in every member state. If some member states engage in such borrowing, it would lead to a distortion of capital markets and it is not difficult to see circumstances in which that distortion might lead to market turbulence which would damage the interests of every member state.

It would in a sense introduce into the single currency area decision-making process precisely the market pressures to which the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington referred. We do not want the position where market operators can conclude that sovereign borrowers within a single currency area have collectively become a bad risk. If we enter that world, the countries within a single currency region would collectively run a serious risk of damaging their interests as a result of market turbulence.

Mr. Bill Walker: I admire the intellectual way in which my hon. Friend is answering the debate. Is he saying that, if we accept a single currency and we cannot borrow and cannot print money, we will still have financial control?

Mr. Dorrell: If we chose—and I emphasise that point—to go for a single currency, we would have satisfied ourselves that the arrangements for managing it were adequate. We would also accept the obligation placed on ourselves—as on every other country within the single currency area—to limit official borrowing to avoid the market turbulence and damage to our collective interests that would flow if that restraint did not exist.

Mr. Shore: Is it the Minister's view that, when stage 3 is reached, it would be more damaging to Britain—if it had an excess deficit like that of the coming year—to upset the smooth running of the system, or would it be in our interests simply to accept the reasons for our excess deficit, and that it would be far too harmful to reduce it, even if that had the effect of ruffling the surface of the single currency?

Mr. Dorrell: Earlier, there was some discussion of confidence in our own abilities. If we reached the conclusion—and the Government have done so—that in the circumstances of 1993-94 an 8 per cent. budget deficit was not excessive, we would have done so on our own authority. In the belief that that stood up as a rational analysis, we would be able to persuade the Commission and the Council of the truth of that. That is the importance of recognising that reference values are not absolute limits. The only result that will flow from breaking a reference value will be an obligation on the Commission to produce a report.

As to whether there is a deflationary bias, the hon. Member for Walsall, North said that the system is contrary to everything for which Labour has always campaigned. The Committee must ask what is contrary to everything for which Labour has campaigned. It is not a 3 per cent. deficit or a 6 per cent. debt to GDP—it is excessive budget deficits. Although I might want, on a partisan platform, to represent Labour as pursuing a voluntary policy of pursuing excessive deficits, I cannot believe that Labour Members want, out of their own mouths, that policy ascribed to them as being the ambition of 100 years of political activity.

Mr. Winnick: I certainly did not want to give the impression that the labour movement, or the Labour party, was started with the aim of achieving as high a deficit as possible; that has never been our position. My argument is that at times—such as the present time—a deficit far higher than 3 per cent. may well be necessary if we are to reduce mass unemployment substantially, and to implement health and welfare policies. We should not have to apologise for such a deficit; certainly, we should not have to grovel to a foreign body. I was complaining about that, rather than suggesting that a high deficit was necessary or desirable at all times.

Mr. Dorrell: Clearly we could continue to argue about the issue for some time; and no doubt we shall do so, in the context of the Finance Bill.

5.45 am

Mr. Legg: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No. I want to end my speech.

I am not in favour of excessive budget deficits. I favour restraint for its own sake, because I believe that it is the best way of delivering growth and improving living standards. I also recognise that, if this country opted for a single currency at some future date, a necessary part of the collective obligation of operating such a currency would be not to allow excessive official borrowing by any of the participants. For both those reasons, I do not support the amendments.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I do not wish to detain the Committee, but before he sat down the Minister promised that he would answer a question that I had asked him. He has not honoured that promise. I should be content if he said that he would write to me.

Mr. Dorrell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. I should be grateful if I could write to the hon. Gentleman.

The Chairman: I am delighted that bonhomie has prevailed at this early hour.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I must take up the Financial Secretary's remark about being tempted to misrepresent Labour's position on deficits. I hope that, now that he has made that confession, he will take the earliest opportunity to correct a gross misrepresentation of our position that was repeated not just immediately before and during the general election, but in the Budget debate over the past few days. It was suggested that we were committed to £35 billion of extra expenditure.

I strongly agree with hon. Members on both sides of the House that it is appalling that we should debate such important matters in the middle of the night. Whatever view hon. Members may take of the treaty, the Bill or deficits, the House cannot do proper justice to such issues after more than 12 hours of debate. We know that the Liberal Democrats, as well as the Government, are responsible for this; the public will draw their own conclusions.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Far be it from me to defend the Liberal Democrats, but in casting aspersions on them the hon. Gentleman must accept that his own party polled considerably under strength in the vote concerned.

Mr. Smith: That certainly is not true. [Interruption.] I understand that the majority was 17, and that 17 Liberals voted with the Government.

I do not think that the Minister has really addressed the points that have been raised, especially those raised by Labour Members. He seemed to be trying to convince the House that the Bill and the treaty did not need to be reinterpreted to operate satisfactorily; I wish to make the opposite case.

We have never claimed—and I would not do so now—that the treaty or the Bill was perfect. We had to judge the package as a whole, as did the Labour party conference which decided:

"Conference believes that the Maastricht Treaty, while not perfect, is the best agreement that can currently be achieved."

Mr. Spearing: I have made the point several times but not, I think, in public, that the very judgment to which my hon. Friend refers surely depends on our three important financial debates. Many of us will have concluded that although, as the Labour party judged, the Maastricht treaty offers the best terms available, they are not good enough. My hon. Friend and his immediate colleagues have not paid sufficient attention to that issue; if they did, they would realise that the terms are not good enough and that we should not support the treaty.

Mr. Smith: I will endeavour to convince my hon. Friend otherwise, although in view of what I know about his long-held position and the arguments that he advances in support of it, which I genuinely respect, I am not overly optimistic about my ability to do so.

Several important issues arise from the question of the deficit, as mentioned by my right hon. Friend the member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and my hon.

Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). We must make it clear that the criteria set out in the treaty are not blanket requirements but triggers, aspects of economic performance to be evaulated in determining how far the economies of the various member states have converged prior to the establishment of economic and monetary union and, in part, as one set of considerations to evaluate comparative economic performance after such a union. They are not cast in stone, and we have made it clear several times that it is not acceptable for them to be interpreted in a mechanistic or inflexible way.

As has been said, the articles applying the criteria explicity require them to take account of wider economic considerations. For example, the article on Government deficits requires the Commission to take account of the extent of Government investment expenditure. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney referred to that point. He began by saying that because investment expenditures were, I think, about 2 per cent. of gross domestic product, they were not too significant. However, in relation to a target within the treaty of 3 per cent. for the overall deficit, the extent of that 2 per cent. room for manoeuvre and whether or not one has it—I argue that we should—makes a considerable difference.

Mr. Shore: Perhaps the Minister could advise us on this matter. Are we talking about a 3 per cent. guideline plus the public investment programme? I believe that that is highly unlikely.

Mr. Smith: The treaty establishes a 3 per cent. guideline, but says that account must be taken of Government investment expenditure as well as the medium-term budgetary position, with which I shall deal in a moment. I suggest that there is an ambiguity, which should be exploited in the interests of flexibility.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is replying to the debate rationally and reasonably. If I put a hypothetical case to him, will he consider it? If we had proceeded to stage 3——

The Chairman: Order. Interventions have been getting longer since I have been in the Chair. Interventions are traditionally very short, and I hope that this one will be short.

Mr. Winterton: I am sorry, Mr. Morris, but I had hardly got to my feet.

The Chairman: There would be little point in my intervening after the hon. Gentleman had spoken at excessive length, so I invite him to make a short intervention.

Mr. Winterton: Of course, Mr. Morris. I greatly admire your dexterity in such matters.

Bearing in mind the restrictions that are apparently laid down in the legislation, will the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) tell me what action he believes that the Government would be able to take if we were at stage 3 and had a budget deficit of £50 billion, and the Commission hauled us over the coals and found our explanation unacceptable?

Mr. Andrew Smith: If a Labour Government were in office we would have implemented our proposals for growth and expanding employment, so the GDP would be high enough to bear the level of borrowing within the criteria, interpreted with flexibility appropriate to the circumstances on which we would also have insisted.

I was saying that the criteria require the wider issues to be taken into account, including the medium-term economic and budgetary position of the member state.

Ms Abbott: We are now back to the familiar line of argument from Labour Front-Bench spokesmen—that the text of the treaty does not mean what it appears to mean. If the criteria are as flexible as my hon. Friend with the collusion of Ministers, argues, when the German Bundestag ratified Maastricht last year why did it pass a specific resolution on EMU saying:

"The stability criteria for the move to stage 3 of EMU will be narrowly and strictly defined . . . the German Bundestag will oppose any attempt to evade the stability criteria that were agreed in Maastricht"?

Is my hon. Friend not whistling in the wind? Does not the flexibility exist only in the imagination of Front-Bench spokesmen?

The Chairman: Order. One question is enough.

Mr. Smith: I would always be happy to take more than one question from my hon. Friend.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your advice. Is it not the practice that interventions in Committee must be both brief and concise? I seek your advice, because I was of the opinion—

The Chairman: Order. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Abbott) referred to the words of the treaty and suggested that I was trying to deviate from the text. The relevant part of the text says:

"The report of the Commission shall also take into account whether the government deficit exceeds government investment expenditure, and take into account all other relevant factors, including the medium term economic and budgetary position of the Member State."

I am talking about the way in which we should argue with our colleagues in Europe that those words should interpreted.

My hon. Friend is right to say that there are people in Europe, including some people in the German Parliament, who may wish to take a different view. I suggest that we should ally ourselves with those who are pressing for a flexible interpretation, as opposed to some of the arguments that I have heard in the debate, which would cement us into acceptance of a narrow definition which would not be in the interests of the Labour movement, or of this country.

To return to the thread of my argument, the third key point about the criteria is one about which we have not heard much in the debate so far. It is that the protocol on convergence criteria specifically requires the Council of Ministers to adopt appropriate provisions to lay down the details of the criteria, which will then replace those set out in the protocol. So the opportunity is there for member states to make it clear, as we urge the British Government to do, that the criteria should not be defined or deployed to implement monetarist policies or to inhibit economic recovery in the member states.

We have long advocated the course that the Government should advocate—the course that they should have advocated when they held the Community presidency: that convergence should include the measures for employment, industry, investment and the environment which are essential for economic recovery in this country and in the rest of Europe. There is a powerful injunction on them to do that in article 102a, which states:

"Member States shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community, as defined in Article 2".

6 am

Mr. Spearing: Does my hon. Friend agree that the proof of the pudding is in the eating? Earlier, I asked a question about the current request to nations to report on their convergence programme. I believe that such a request has come to Her Majesty's Government. I understand that, in that request—even before the treaty—the wide interpretation that my hon. Friend advocates has not been placed on the provisions. Should not we ascertain from the Government the request that they have received and the reply that they have given, so that we can test the proposition that my hon. Friend puts to the Committee?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right that the treaty contains a provision for a report on convergence to be submitted. It would clearly be inappropriate for the Government to submit such a report before the Bill giving effect to the treaty had been approved by the House. I am sure that if the Government have submitted one, or are working on it, the Minister will intervene to tell us the exact position. If the Bill and the treaty are implemented, such a report will presumably be submitted.

I was referring to the need for more flexible interpretation of the criteria in the interests of economic recovery not merely in this country but throughout Europe. Reference was made earlier to the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition. I will quote from my right hon. and learned Friend's speech in Paris on 15 January. It is important to make the Labour party's position on these issues clear, and there is no better way of doing that. My right hon. and learned Friend said in that speech:

"It would also, I believe, be misguided for the European Community as a whole to make the same mistake of seeking arbitrarily to curb public deficits at a time when the European economy is poised on the verge of recession. There is clearly a danger that this may occur if the fiscal deficit rules of the Maastricht Treaty are rigidly interpreted. An excessively strict application of the protocol which specifies a target of 3 per cent. for government deficits would compound the existing financial squeeze which has been caused by high interest rates in Germany.

If all member states of the EC tried to satisfy the 3 per cent. target by the end of 1996, for example . . . the combined effect on total EC output would be a reduction of over 2 per cent. This is obviously absurd and simply not feasible for a majority of member states of the Community. I would argue very strongly that the 3 per cent. rule must exclude all deficit-funded capital investment and take full account of the state of the economic cycle in each member state and in particular trends in unemployment.

The Community will need to clarify these points if it is to avoid adding a fiscal choke to the monetary grip that has already sharply reduced growth in the European economy."

I put it to the Committee that there could be no clearer, firmer or more persuasive statement of the Labour party's position. We are opposed to a deflationary impact of the criteria and to an inflexible or mechanistic interpretation of them.

Mr. Hain: I warmly welcome my hon. Friend's reference to the Labour party's official policy as expounded by its leader. Is there not a difficulty in interpreting the flexibility of the convergence criteria, however? All the countries are locked together seeking to achieve the criteria required by the treaty. No country wants to achieve what is required and then find that another country is being let off the hook. The countries are forced, in a sense, to follow each other in achieving the aim. If they do not, there is no level playing field. The difficulty with establishing the criteria in the way in which the treaty establishes them is that the countries are placing pressure on each other to achieve them, and that, if some do not, others will start to complain. That is why it is difficult to interpret the criteria flexibly.

Mr. Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend. He is saying that it is important to have co-ordination for flexibility and recovery and not for inflexibility and deflation. Not just the Labour party in this country is saying that. There has been increasing support in the Commission for the view that I am putting forward. There has also been support in the European Parliament and in other member states. I will give examples. On 17 February, the Commissioner for Economic Affairs, Henning Christophersen, said in Brussels that the interpretation of the criteria involved

"political judgment, and a deficit of more than 3 per cent. would not necessarily infringe the criteria if this was caused by action to tackle a cyclical recession."

On 23 February, the Finance Minister of Belgium was reported to have said:

"It is not to be ruled out that the member states will revise one of the four criteria foreseen by the Maastricht Treaty for entry to the final phase of economic and monetary union, the one relative to the maximum threshold of the budget deficit set at 3 per cent. of the national product."

He was reported as saying that if the rate of growth of the economy remained next year as low as that for the present year, the threshold could be increased to allow EC states to support economic activity.

On 9 March, in relation to the European Parliament debate on unemployment and the annual economic report, Mr Christophersen said it had been established "that the criteria should not be used in a mechanical way."

On 12 March this year the European Parliament adopted a resolution on the annual economic report calling on the Commission and the Council

"to make it clear that the excessive deficit criterion defined in the Maastricht Treaty must be applied over the economic cycle and that increases in budget deficits resulting from economic recession should not in themselves lead to tax increases or public spending cuts which could damage long-term development and drive the European or national economy further into recession."

I give those examples—there are others—to show how opinion in the rest of Europe, reacting to the scale of the recession, on the verge of which Europe as a whole is poised, is saying that it must be interpreted flexibly and that we need growth and not deflation.

Dr. Godman: Does my hon. Friend agree that effective implementation of article 104c depends heavily on article 109c? What is his view of the structure of the monetary committee? Is it a European Community-wide select committee, or some kind of police force which can decide to investigate the economic management of member states?

Mr. Smith: It will not be an effective police force, as it has only advisory powers, although I agree that they will be strengthened when the financial committee comes into effect, if progress is made towards economic and monetary union. But I agree with my hon. Friend that much turns on the interpretation placed on article 104c, and I have been developing that argument. I suggest that in common with the growing volume of voices in Europe calling for the flexible interpretation of the provisions, we should conclude that instead of imagining that the convergency criteria are fixed and cannot be changed, we should be arguing that they are capable of a more flexible interpretation. We must continue to stress that it is vital for economic recovery in Europe that that flexibility is secured.

Mr. Leighton: Nobody seems to be bound by those words. The Leader of the Opposition said in his speech in Paris that it could lead to a cut in overall output of more than 2·5 per cent.—in other words, it could lead to another recession—and he added that the position must be clarified. The position has not been clarified. Therefore, we should vote against the provision. My hon. Friend seems to be saying that 3 per cent. does not mean 3 per cent. —that it might mean 5 or 6 per cent. We now have 8·5 per cent. He also says that it is meaningless. It is not meaningless. He knows that we attended a meeting with a representative of Jacques Delors who said that the criteria mean something. They are provided by the Germans, who are not prepared to have their mark made into a Mickey Mouse currency. They want real guarantees for their currency.

Mr. Smith: I was not suggesting that the criteria did not mean anything. Clearly, they mean something.

No one is suggesting that any level of public deficit can be sustained indefinitely. The important question is the relation of the level of public deficit to the position in the economic cycle, how that pans out over the whole of the cycle and how it stands in relation to investment expenditure. Those matters will be clarified at the end of the day through the various Community institutions. The European Parliament will have an influence and, obviously, the Commission will have a voice. Ultimately, the determining factor will be the statements issued by the European Council.

In conjunction with our colleagues in the rest of Europe, we must take every opportunity to argue for a rational interpretation of the criteria which make some growth possible.

Mr. Cash: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's attempt to put some latter-day rationale into his argument. Does he accept that the whole object of the arrangement was to be modelled on the Bundesbank, which had a rigid, determined approach that all of this would somehow achieve price stability? The whole argument has been blown open, as happened with the exchange rate mechanism. People must acknowledge that the arrangement will not work but that somehow we must continue marching with this. Therefore, one comes up with another adaptation to it; we will be flexible. If there is such a tremendous desire to get this through, does the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) recognise that we have reached the point at which we recognise that the arrangement will not work at all and that we should pack up our bags and take the whole thing back to where it came from?

Mr. Smith: No. The record of past years shows that we are in a weak position, especially when the hon. Gentleman is so contemptuous of what the Bundesbank has achieved. We do not want to emulate it in every respect, but the achievements in Germany in terms of low inflation, generally high employment, growth and living standards deserve to be examined constructively.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend is arguing for a flexible approach to the criteria. As Labour Members are in favour of a single currency because they believe that it is a good thing, is my hon. Friend becoming worried about such flexibility? Would it be better to be inflexible, get the pain over quickly and reach the ideal on a single currency as quickly as possible?

Mr. Smith: Inflexibility in these matters threatens to plunge us into a deep recession which I do not want to see.

How one judges the 3 per cent. depends on the period it covers. There were some references to this earlier. It is important to stress that the treaty commitment and the definitions in the treaty do not refer to the public sector borrowing requirement; they refer to the Government's lending position on the ESA definition. The ESA definition is not the same as the public sector borrowing requirement.

If one takes the record of general net lending borrowing by the Conservative Government from 1979-1991 and applies a 3 per cent. criteria, saying that the Government should have spent 3 per cent. of the gross domestic product, we would have not less but more public expenditure, to the tune of £39 billion over that period. I do not make that point to suggest that the criterion is always easy to live with, even across the medium or longer term, but to illustrate that it depends what period one takes the criterion to apply to.

Mr. Chisholm: With reference to the 1980s, surely the surplus was a result of privatisation and North sea oil. Those were unusual circumstances. The effect across Europe of the 3 per cent. criterion would be massive public expenditure cuts. Are not the two main thrusts of this monetarist treaty zero inflation and the cutting of public expenditure to make Europe have the same level of public expenditure and social provision as the rival economic powers of Japan and America?

Mr. Smith: The figures that I quoted excluded privatisation receipts because the definition excludes them. I merely used them to illustrate that it depends on the period across which one takes the 3 per cent. to apply.

I argue that we should have deficit finance public expenditure, especially for investment and counter-cyclical purposes. As hon. Members have said, article 104c specifically excludes circumstances in which the excess over the reference value is exceptional and temporary. There is an argument, and we certainly must make it, that action taken to counter a recession is, of its nature, temporary, precisely because of the nature of the cyclical process.

Dr. Godman: Does my hon. Friend agree that article 104c is riddled with ambiguities? For instance, it would appear that the United Kingdom has been granted immunity from the imposition of sanctions. Yet at this moment, we do not know whether the United Kingdom Government would be able to sit in judgment on others who are deemed to have broken the rules.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend has made several telling contributions to the debate and uncovered areas of legal and procedural uncertainty on precisely such matters. I shall be interested to receive a copy of whatever written reply the Government send him. [Interruption.] The Minister has received a note from the Box and is in a position to give us the information now.

Mr. Dorrell: I am advised that in stage 3, the United Kingdom would take part in the assessment under article 104c, but not in the vote on sanctions if it was not a full participant in stage 3.

Mr. Smith: Thank you. I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion now, but I could not do so without referring to the amendments within the group which we on the Opposition Front Bench intend to press to a vote. In this and the preceding debate, we have emphasised how important article 2 is. We have stressed our commitment to work for its full application. I draw the attention of the Committee to new clause 57, which is extremely important in that respect and attempts to address some of the anxieties that my right hon. and hon. Friends have expressed.

New clause 57 seeks to incorporate in the Bill a requirement that—before submitting information to the Commission, either under the provisions of multilateral surveillance as in article 103(3) or under the excessive deficit requirements of article 104c, which we have spent so much time discussing, the House shall consider "an assessment of the medium term economic and budgetary position in relation to the social, economic and environmental goals set out in Title II, Article 2".

It further requires that this assessment

"shall form the basis of any submission to the Commission under" these articles. There could be no clearer indication of our intention to link the implementation of the treaty and closer European co-operation to the goals of article 2.

As I have said, it is our intention to press new clause 57 to a vote. It is buttressed by our proposed new clause 2 which would set multilateral surveillance firmly in the context of economic growth, industrial investment, employment and the balance of trade and compare Britain's performance with that of other member states. We also wish to press that new clause to a vote. Amendment No. 19 and others of a similar nature which were tabled as probing amendments will not be pressed to a vote.

I urge the House to make it clear that we do not want the convergence criteria to be applied in a mechanistic or inflexible way, and to signal that we want to insist on their being interpreted to foster and not to frustrate concerted action for sustainable economic growth and jobs. The best way to do that is to vote for the two amendments.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I shall be brief. I agreed entirely with the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) until his final exhortations about the two new clauses, neither of which commends itself to the Committee. They are both innocuous to the extent that one wonders whether they are a small part of an ulterior exercise. If one examines existing budgetary practice and what is likely to happen in the European Commission, it follows from what has already been agreed that both are likely to be put into practice. Apart from that, there was great good sense in what the hon. Gentleman had to say.

I wish to take a more federal viewpoint than has been heard so far in the debate, touching on what the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said in moving the amendment. What he found so obnoxious in the provisions attached to this part of the Maastricht treaty was, to use the right hon. Gentleman's words, an alien body being able to impose itself on Britain or any other member state. Later in the same speech, he said that he understood and respected those who took a federal viewpoint, though he did not agree with it. That is where the right hon. Gentleman and I part company. We see Europe not as an alien body but as an entity within which we are increasingly integrated, and we want to continue down that track.

Some of the genuine difficulties that have arisen in the progress towards stages 2 and 3—economic and monetary union, a single currency and the deficits—reflect, first, the fact that the political and economic context has changed since the original Delors report and, secondly, that the world and the European Community have moved on politically since the negotiation and agreement of the Maastricht treaty.

Those who are worried about the apparent or perceived inflexibility of some of the articles would be well advised to remember that, ultimately, the European Commission and any other bodies that may flow from this part of the treaty have to be responsive to the real politics with which they are dealing.

The Government have been pointing to several decisions that have been taken in the European courts and elsewhere, which they say are representative of the new mood of subsidiarity across the Community. I have always found a mood of subsidiarity rather difficult and tricky to capture. However, the Government have a fair point in emphasising the fact that, as it is a political organisation, the institutions of the European Community, including the Commission and the central bank, must be seen to be responsive to the unit parts—the individual member states.

That is why, in political terms as well as for reasons of political muscle referred to earlier, there is cause for optimism that the kind of interpretations that some of us have been pointing to during the debate will hold sway. We all have our party axes to grind—or perhaps, our particular viewpoints to exert—in the course of this debate. It is worth looking at what we would all agree is an objective source, the Library of the House. It looked back to the original Delors proposals.

Mr. Spearing: We are not there now.

Mr. Kennedy: No, we have moved on since then.

Mr. Spearing: Yes.

Mr. Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. The point is that, since the original Delors proposals, we have moved on, and the position is even better now than it was then, for reasons which I will outline. The original criteria were too inflexible, because they concentrated too heavily on one year's budget outturn. The briefing note from the Library goes on to say:

"Furthermore, in the light of the pressure exerted upon government borrowing because of the slow down in growth of a number—not just ourselves, but a number—

"of Member States, Commission officials have begun to place more emphasis upon the direction that debt and borrowing levels are moving rather than their absolute levels."

That is an important point to enter into the record—that this is not just some kind of freeze-frame that we are looking at: it is a continuous reel, and it is therefore one which, by definition, will be more flexible than some of the most dire warnings that we have heard expressed in the course of the debate would suggest.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because it was my sotto voce intervention to which he kindly responded. Has not the argument throughout the evening showed that while, as he says, Commission officials may have moved in that direction, things could move in the other direction, just as the climate of the European Court of Justice has moved? What the hon. Gentleman is saying confirms our fears that this arbitrary and official rigidity could move back, even on his interpretation, and still be within the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Kennedy: As is the case in so many of the debates throughout the process of this piece of legislation, from my own political standpoint, I feel that the hon. Gentleman's point could be best addressed by our being more integrated rather than less, as he would wish to argue. The whole logic of the European case is that, if we want to influence in a favourable way the outcomes and decisions taken at European level——

Mr. Spearing: By officials.

Mr. Kennedy: By officials at the moment, because all the institutions, again from a federal point of view, are not democratic enough. We are going a bit wider there, Mr. Morris, than perhaps we are allowed to in this set of arguments. My whole case would be—I will come to this in the specific context of the parts that we have been debating through the night—that, as a general rule, we are more likely to exert more influence by being more integrated, not by being more stand-offish or semi-detached or whatever phrase might be appropriate to characterise the hon. Gentleman's position.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman will know that I am not altogether hostile to federalism, but I should like to ask him how the cause of federalism in the European Community is advanced by the implementation of articles 103.3, 104c and 109c. To my mind, the implementation of those articles strengthens the central institutions which have at the moment enormous power, although far from federalist in structure.

6.30 am

Mr. Kennedy: The economists who informed and advised during the Maastricht neogitations were operating against two different backgrounds. One was a set of economic theories that said that countries will try to free-ride over any economic difficulties involving their currencies, that it would be a free-for-all which would bleed the centre, and that no centralised institution can withstand that. The other argument was that one would have to have excessive centralism and downward pressure on all member states.

I appreciate that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) feels that there is too much downward pressure, but the achievements of the Maastricht process, if not the happiest of halfway houses, were more of a compromise than would have been the case if one considers the original Delors package, which preceded Maastricht.

Consider our currency union within the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and I have argued about the applicability of comparing our Union with that envisaged in the Maastricht treaty. Our currency union, for which the Government, the Treasury and the Bank of England are responsible, involves tight, centralised controls, not least over local spending and borrowing. I find it inconsistent that some hon. Members will happily vote for rate capping and all sorts of other controls of local government because of the single currency demands of our currency, yet the milder proposals for union in the treaty cause them such massive offence.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman is as knowledgeable as I on the objectives of the Act of Union 1707, and the treaty signed at the time. He will know that the economic, monetary and political objectives of that Union were almost identical to the objectives proposed and written into the treaty. The clauses are different, but the objectives are clearly stated and almost identical. I therefore view the treaty as a centralising process—not federal at this stage—which will create much the same circumstances as in our Union with a single currency, a single Chancellor of the Exchequer and single borrowing requirement, all controlled from the centre. The Scots have complained about that for years. I am happy with it, and the hon. Member objects to, but I am not happy for that to be done in Europe.

Mr. Kennedy: The hour is late, and we are almost getting into Scottish political theology. I agree that we have a far too centralised constitutional settlement in the United Kingdom. In trying to draw a comparison between the 1707 Act and the events surrounding it and the Maastricht treaty, the hon. Gentleman overlooks something fundamental—federalism. Whether that word is acceptable, or used in its proper context in this country —or at least in a context that will be understood by our Community partners—it is certainly used in other countries, notably Germany, essentially to mean decentralisation—and I must stress that.

Sir Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Kennedy: Having lit the blue touch paper, I must give way to a Scot who represents another part of the Union.

Sir Teddy Taylor: While the hon. Member might be right in thinking that the Commission and the Council will be moderate and reasonable in applying the terms of article 104c, does he accept that the wording is such that it could be applied restrictively and oppressively? As we do not know what the Commission or the Council is doing, would not it be far safer to have wording that avoided repressive, restrictive policies, which would simply add to unemployment and misery?

Mr. Kennedy: The constitution of the old Soviet Union promised every freedom under the sun, and, in respect of [Mr. Kennedy]

Hong Kong, the Basic Law to which the Government of China have put their names guarantees all the things that all Members on both sides of the Committee would advocate. However, experience, suspicion, cynicism and canniness about the former Soviet Union, as well as the Hong Kong settlement to come, make us worry. Others may take a different view, but I do not regard those who operate at Brussels level in the same way as I regarded the old Soviet Government or as I regard the current administration of old men in China. I am more relaxed and more laid back in my interpretation of the words in this part of the article than the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor).

This applies not least to paragraph 3, which provides that, if there is excessive Government expenditure, leading to an excessive deficit, other relevant factors, including the medium-term economic and budgetary position of the member state, will be taken into account. It seems to me that that is a helpful addition, rather than something about which we should be excessively suspicious or over which we should lose sleep. [Laughter.] My words are being laughed at out of context.

Underlying the economic and monetary union mechanism that is built into the treaty is the need, if we are to overcome the suspicions and hostilities that have been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, for more building in of European institutions that are felt by the citizens they are intended to serve to be European. As has been seen in the context of other parts of the legislation—we shall return to this matter at later stages—this can be done only by providing a more democratic structure and adopting a much more federal approach. That is the means of addressing these anxieties in the same way as several of the more positive ideals and aspirations of some of us.

Mr. Wood rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The Committee has now been sitting for 14 hours. Would you accept a motion to move progress?

The Chairman: Yes. I shall put that Question now.

Motion made, and Question put, That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Order. I have accepted a point of order, and have already put the Question.

The Committee proceeded to a Division:—

Mr. Spearing (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I do not like wearing the hat, but I wish to make a serious point, and this is the only way in which I can do so. I asked permission to move to report progress, and you said that you were prepared to accept a motion. Then my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) rose on a point of order. I therefore sat down, because a point of order takes precedence. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I was prepared to speak, and I believe that under the Standing Orders of the House, if an occupant of the Chair accepts a motion to report progress and an hon. Member has suggested that he wishes to move it, and to speak to it—I gave you notice of my intentions, because I wished to speak to the motion—the Committee should have an opportunity to debate it, if that is necessary. I wished to speak on the Question that you put, Mr. Morris, and I think that you knew that that was my intention.

The Chairman: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is quite right; he gave me notice that he intended to raise the point of order, and that enabled me to check on the Standing Orders and to weigh up the situation. Standing Order 34(1) says:

"If . . . the chairman, shall be of opinion that a dilatory motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, he may forthwith put the question thereupon from the chair, or he may decline to propose the question thereupon to the . . . committee."

I decided to put the Question forthwith. It has been put. It was proposed and it was opposed. Therefore, there is a Division. Therefore, we shall proceed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. May I inform you that not only did those who wanted to speak after you had put the motion rise after you had done so, but we are also expecting many more hon. Members to return for a continuation of the debate, and it would be convenient for most of them to find that the debate was continuing?

The Chairman: It is not for me to anticipate who may be coming to the debate. I accepted the motion from the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

The Committee having divided: Ayes 35, Noes 244.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Irvine Patnick and
Mr. Andrew Mackay.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I wonder whether you can help the Committee and me with two specific matters. The first relates to the use of the article of headgear. There has been some comment oustide this place on the matter. I hope that you will agree that the recent incident shows a legitimate use of something on the head when an hon. Member raises a legitimate point of order during a Division. The Committee might bear that in mind when people criticise procedures which appear arcane but which have some use.

My second point relates to the Standing Order which you helpfully quoted in the exchanges. The Committee realises that any Chairman of any Committee can at any time refuse a motion to report progress when, clearly, that is not an issue on which there can be legitimate points of order. When the use of the word "abuse" is quoted from the Standing Orders, you have the option of taking it forthwith and not permitting a short debate. I am sure that you will rule that such a debate can be relatively short because any hon. Member has the power to move a closure on a debate and for the Chair to accept it, even after 10 minutes, quarter of an hour or half an hour, as the Chair supposes. I hope that you will confirm that that is true.

My main point is the extent to which—[Interruption.] I am sure that you will accept that I have asked for three rulings so far. My fourth point relates to the use and interpretation of the word "abuse". It would be a pity if the difficulties which we have just experienced were repeated. I submit that, when the Committee has done eight hours overtime—[Interruption.] The choice to do that was in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, not the House of Commons. It is the choice of the Government, not the Committee, to keep us here.

Moreover, the debates have been of mountainous economic and national significance, which the media may not have covered. When the Government keep us here, it is not an abuse of the Committee for there to be a short debate on the Question that we report progress, because clearly the political area that has been covered in that time is great. I hope that you will be able to clarify that matter, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The Committee will know that he has been particularly assiduous in his attendance through the night. Headgear is a matter for the Procedure Committee. The word "abuse" is quoted in the Standing Order, so I have no choice but to use that word. When the hon. Gentleman moved his motion, the Chair had to decide one of three courses of action. The Chair could decide to refuse the motion altogether, to allow a Division only or to allow a debate and a Division. I chose the middle course.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In applying the Standing Orders, the Chairman obviously uses his objective assessment. What worries me is that, as I came in and sat down on the Front Bench below the Gangway, I heard distinctly—it was not particularly inaudible—a Tory Whip tell the Liberals that my hon. Friend intended to move to report progress, that the motion would be taken immediately, and that it would be defeated and we would carry on. If that is the case, the source of information must have been yourself. Therefore, the interpretation is that you acted in collusion with the Tory Whips.

The Chairman: Order. To the best of my knowledge, the hon. Gentleman has only recently returned to the Chamber. When the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) was kind enough to come to the Chair to say that he proposed to raise a point of order and move to report progress, it was my responsibility to the Committee to check the Standing Orders and the options available to me. If any hon. Member came to the Chair and asked me what the options were, I would give them guidance. I take my decision entirely on my own. Those who can recognise what interpretation I may put on it simply show their political acumen.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The argument is not about any judgment that you made but about the fact that the discussion between you and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing)—in which he sought clarification of what would be the response to his suggestion that the Committee should report progress—became known to Conservative Members, and in particular the Government Whips.

The issue is serious. We are well accustomed to the coalition between the Tory party and the Liberals, which worked closely through the night. [Interruption.] I know that Conservative Members are tired and overwrought, but they should listen to this. This is a matter for all Members, not just for my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South, who raised the point. When Members seek the guidance of the Chair, it ought to be assumed that it is a private conversation in which an hon. Member seeks guidance.

I fully understand that it is not easy in the context of a crowded House to hold a private conversation, but clearly the Government Whips knew what action you were likely to take, Mr. Morris. That is not within the normal processes of the House. If it is impossible for Members to seek guidance privately from you because of the nature of the building, some machinery must be found whereby private advice can be received. It is wrong that the Government Whips knew and fully understood the decision that was made. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) is getting excited and uses the word "stupid".

The Chairman: Order. I hope that I can help the hon. Gentleman. The Opposition Chief Whip came to see me in the early hours of this morning and sought guidance. I gave the right hon. Gentleman guidance. I have no control over what happens to the results of the guidance that I give, but the hon. Gentleman sought guidance and I was able to give it. It may well be that that guidance was not the guidance that the Government Whips thought likely, and I suspect that it was not. With respect, it is my job to give guidance on the options open to me and how I see a position.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I hope that these are new points of order.

7.30 am

Mr. Gould: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You kindly and correctly set out the options with which you were confronted when my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) approached you with the suggestion that he might move to report progress. Hon. Members on all sides of the House understand that that is a matter for your discretion and you have explained the decision that you made. However, you also said—you elaborated that point in your last statement—that if you were approached by any hon. Member, you would discuss the options before you and the likely course——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman may come back. I do not discuss the options; I clarify what the options are.

Mr. Gould: I am willing to use that phraseology. You clarify the options available to you.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South will confirm that he was unaware of the option, choice or decision that you were likely to make.

The Chairman: The hon. Member for Newham, South did not come back and ask me.

Mr. Gould: In that case, Mr. Morris, we are again on all fours. We agree that the hon. Member who approached you with a view to moving that motion departed from his conversation with you unaware of the decision that you were likely to take. My question to you, Mr. Morris, is that when you said that any——

The Chairman: Order. All hon. Members depart from me unaware of what decision I shall make. The clarification they receive, if they so ask, is what options are available.

Mr. Gould: Nevertheless, although my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South was left in that situation, it is a matter of record, unless one disputes the evidence of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), that other hon. Members appeared to know what your decision was likely to be. When you said that any hon. Member could approach you to ask for a clarification of the options, are we to understand that that includes a Government Whip? Did that happen on that occasion, and was that the way in which a Government Whip appeared to know what your decision would be?

The Chairman: It is perfectly true. The Government Whip sought clarification on the Standing Order and what the options are. That was available to any hon. Member, but nobody knew what decision I was going to make. Nor did any hon. Member earlier in the morning know what decision I was going to make on the clarification I gave the Opposition Chief Whip. What hon. Members appear to judge from that is not for me. Hon. Members know that if there are three options, they have only three possible guesses, and they must make a judgment, based on the way the Committee has proceeded and the attitude I have taken, as to what I am likely to conclude. It is part of the skill of hon. Members in all parts of the House to interpret the situation.

Mr. Rowlands: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As the Committee might come across this again, I wonder whether we might understand the criteria used to decide whether one debates a motion to report progress. Did you research the last precedent when the House sat for 14 hours and the Chairman ruled that the report progress motion should not be debated?

The Chairman: The Chair makes a judgment on the particular point at the time it arises. The precedent is in the Standing Order.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. The House heard you say that you have to act in public on the things that happen in public. The last question about the Chair refusing to accept a motion cannot be relevant, because the motion was accepted, not rejected.

The second point, Mr. Morris, is that, when the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) sought to move the motion, it was accepted by the Chair. The hon. Member for Newham, South did not rise, and only after the question had been put did the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) rise. Surely these points of order are, in effect, trying to delay the proceedings, in the same way as the motion sought to delay the proceedings?

The Chairman: Order. No, they were perfectly fair points of order. If I may say so, I have checked on the rules of the House and on the Standing Orders, and I am working within the Standing Orders. I regret that some hon. Members perhaps do not fully understand the Standing Orders, but that is not the responsibility of the Chair. I have now clarified those Standing Orders. I have clarified the three options that were available to me, and I have decided on this occasion on the middle course. Next time I might decide something different, but that is a matter of judgment for the Chair. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will accept that.

Mr. Rowlands: Further to my point of order, Mr. Morris. Just as Standing Orders are vital to the House, so are precedents. It is therefore not unreasonable for an hon. Member like me to request you to discover for us when was the last time that a Chair, after 14 hours of debate, actually chose not to allow the "report progress" motion to be debated. It is a perfectly reasonable request.

The Chairman: Order. I respectfully suggest to the hon. Gentleman that my job here is to chair the Committee. He can go to the Library and ask that question. [Interruption.]

Mr. Denzil Davies: I beg to move amendment No. 81, in page 1, line 9, after "II", insert

'SECOND STAGE FOR ACHIEVING ECONOMIC AND MONETARY UNION

(1) Article 109e.

(2) Article 109f.

(3) Protocol on the Statute of the European Monetary Institute.'.

Mr. Davies: The amendment mentions "Schedule". In this case the word "Schedule" refers to the second stage of economic and monetary union.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I wish to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say, but it is impossible if there is too much noise. Will those who are leaving please go quickly and quietly?

Mr. Davies: Amendment No. 81 seeks to strike out the whole of the second stage of economic and monetary union, including the European monetary institute and the protocol related to it. Perhaps I may respectfully remind the Committee that this group of amendments deals with the transitional arrangements, with the second stage and the third stage, so it covers the whole of the process towards the final act of a single currency, if that should happen. Amendment No. 409 seeks to exclude the protocol on the convergence criteria which have to be achieved before a member state can enter stage 3. Amendments Nos. 38 and 381 deal with the balance of payments crisis and the power given to the Commission, within those stages, to control and supervise any action taken by a nation state in respect of that balance of payments crisis.

Although chapter 4 of the treaty of union on page 25 is headed "Transitional Provisions", it deals in the main with the second stage and then with the third stage.

Before I discuss those, perhaps I could clarify the legal position. I should like the Financial Secretary to answer some questions. Despite the fact that he has been up all night, he is bright-eyed and bushy-tailed, and I am sure that he will courteously seek to answer questions on the literal interpretation of the text, which is not easy to understand. I give him warning that I shall have to ask such questions.

I am glad to see the Attorney-General here. During most of the debates he has kept a watching brief. We have not had the benefit of his words, but he has looked wise, as Attorneys-General are apparently supposed to do. I shall try to set out the legal position as I understand it. Some of the amendments may be desirable from the Government's point of view, but they may not be necessary—to use the language of the Foreign Secretary or of the Attorney-General.

Stage 2 of economic and monetary union imposes treaty obligations on us. We have not acquired an opt-in or an opt-out to stage 2, which is a treaty obligation. We are not supposed to refer to the gentlemen in the Box, and I do not know whether they are Foreign Office legal advisers, but I see that they agree with me. I am not sure whether that is worrying.

To return to the Attorney-General's helpful intervention on amendment No. 27, when he said in so many words —I should have thought that it was a fairly simple legal point—that if one has a treaty obligation, one must incorporate it into domestic law. The corollary is that, if one has no treaty obligation, one has nothing to incorporate into domestic law.

According to the Government, amendment No. 27 did not create a treaty obligation, so nothing was put into domestic law; thus, it did not really matter what one put into that law.

Stage 3 does not involve any treaty obligations. The Financial Secretary did not say so in so many words, but I am not criticising him. He does not have the courage of the Minister of State, who rushes into the legal arguments with great enthusiasm. Therefore, any amendments to stage 3 are not fundamental to the treaty. I mention that to Members on the Labour Front Bench, so that if they wish to be courageous on this occasion and to vote on an amendment relating to stage 3, they need not worry, because the treaty will be fine and can still be ratified. I think that the Attorney-General will confirm that that is correct. I want my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to be careful not to vote on stage 2 because it might badly hurt the treaty, which apparently the official Labour party supports.

First, I will deal with stage 2. On page 25, the first paragraph of article 109e states:

"The second stage for achieving economic and monetary union shall begin on 1 January 1994."

There is not much time. The treaty may or may not be ratified by then—who knows? No one knows what will happen in the Danish referendum, or in this House and the other place.

Even if the treaty is ratified by 1 August—let us give the Government some hope—there is not much time for the Financial Secretary, the Foreign Office and the Treasury to get their tackle in order, as we shall be straight into stage 2 of economic and monetary union, which is obligatory. We cannot plead the opt-out or the opt-in.

Article 109e continues by stating that even "Before that date"—presumably the date when every country has ratified—and the second stage "each Member State shall" do certain things. In paragraph 2(a) we are told that each member state shall adopt multiannual programmes. I suppose I know what multiannual programmes are—lots of programmes in one year, I take it. As this is Treasury stuff, I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to tell us whether we are to embark on these multiannual programmes in the middle of this year. These are very important programmes.

7.45 am

Mr. Rowlands: I see that the Financial Secretary is shaking his head, but the achievement of economic and monetary union must be the purpose of a multiannual programme.

Mr. Davies: I hope that the Financial Secretary was not indicating dissent. We do not know who is watching these debates. We do not know whether the Commission has a magic eye. We have heard in previous debates that member states must be careful, that they are not supposed to interfere with the Commission. Others may say what they like, but Ministers have to be careful. I hope that we shall be told that these multiannual programmes are starting. Otherwise, after the treaty has been ratified, the Government will be breaking one of the first articles. That would be a bad start.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Which one?

Mr. Davies: I shall try to answer my hon. Friend's question, and the Financial Secretary will no doubt provide clarification. In fact, it seems that he is going to do so now.

Mr. Dorrell: The Red Book is a multiannual programme. It was laid before the House on Budget day.

Mr. Davies: That is a multiannual programme, not just an annual programme?

Mr. Dorrell: Yes. A multiannual programme is one that publishes plans in respect of more than one year.

Mr. Davies: Now the Minister tells us. The Chancellor did not tell us, did he? I wondered why he was putting three Finance Bills into one, and three Budgets into one. They cover three years.

Mr. Spearing: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the words "multiannual programme" are used frequently by the European Community? The EC does not do this in relation to just one general matter of public expenditure, to which I think the Financial Secretary referred, but in relation to programme after programme, sometimes for five or six years ahead. It therefore commits expenditure well ahead of the annual budget. That is the way in which not only the multiannual programme but the whole budget commitment works, irrespective of future economic developments. This practice of our friends and neighbours across the channel has not been a major feature of the United Kingdom until recently.

Mr. Livingstone: Cannot the Government give us an explanation? What is the difference between this multiannual programme, about which they seem so happy, and the old five-year plans of Comrade Stalin, which they regarded as an appalling abuse of human rights which led to dictatorship? How can the Government prevent the multiannual programme from becoming a panoply of Stalinism and repression? What is the difference? Is there a difference?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend asks a very important question and no doubt the Financial Secretary will answer it. He has certainly given us a new name for the Red Book. "Multiannual programme" sounds much better.

Dr. Godman: I should like to offer a concrete example of the imposition of a multiannual programme by the European Community, not by a national Government. The programme to which I refer concerns the size of the United Kingdom fishing fleet. Several years ago the European Community instructed the United Kingdom Government to reduce the size of its fishing fleet, over a period of three years, by about 20 per cent. in terms of horse power and gross registered tonnage. That instruction came from the European Commission by way of a multiannual programme.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is diligent and understands such matters.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is not the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) being a little unfair? Does he not appreciate that the European Community multiannual programmes have huge advantages in terms of flexibility over our programmes? The commitments in the Edinburgh budget are worth millions of pounds more than the available resources. A European Community multiannual programme commits a country to spending far more money than it has. If we apply that principle to our resources, expenditure and budget, we can do extremely well. The method was used in 1988 when, because of a multiannual programme and working on a metric year of 10 months, it was possible to spend 20 per cent. more. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not allow himself to throw out the possible advantages of the much greater degree of flexibility afforded by the EC's multiannual programmes, under which one can spend far more than one has, and nobody seems to complain.

Mr. Davies: Does my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) wish to amplify the argument?

Mr. Spearing: The recent exchanges show the value of Committee procedure. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the introduction of commitments ahead of the raising of taxation strikes at the root of the financial power of the house over any Government who determine expenditure year on year? Making a commitment too far ahead—particularly in respect of the European Community—means that money is committed ahead of the economic circumstances and taxation at the time, which means that control over the Executive of the day is lost.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is correct. I know something of the subject because, years ago, I used to have some ministerial responsibility—if that is not stretching it a bit—over the EEC budget. The Treasury was hard on the EEC budget and did not like the spending commitments whereby money was spent in one year and rolled over to the next, because the Treasury could not control the process. The Treasury was, rightly, austere.

No doubt in the laxer financial climate that prevails under the present Government—who create public sector borrowing requirements of up to £50 billion and more—the Treasury has been worn down. I am sure that the Financial Secretary can tell us.

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman is performing a remarkable feat: apparently he is signing up all his right hon. and hon. Friends to the sternest and strictest interpretation of the principle of annuality, which has historically been ascribed to Her Majesty's Treasury. That is something for which the Treasury is usually more criticised in the House than praised. Are we to take it that out of the window will go support for year-end flexibility and for taking a longer-term perspective? A multiannual programme is simply a commitment to look at an economic programme over more than one calendar year —in every other debate in which the subject has arisen in the House that policy has been accepted by both sides of the House as a good thing.

Mr. Davies: The Financial Secretary is perhaps making too much of the matter. I was saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South and the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) have argued that the way in which the EC has developed is different from the way in which the Treasury used to do things when I was a Treasury Minister. I was merely making a neutral statement. Perhaps Treasury Ministers then were pedantic, old-fashioned or wrong—but the Treasury always used to argue strongly against the idea of a carry-over. Obviously it is somethimes necessary to adopt the carry-over policy when dealing with large projects, such as those relating to defence.

However, payments and commitments were constantly being made in relation to the Eurpoean budget and it was sometimes difficult to follow what was happening and to maintain control. The Treasury was sensible to do so then, but we now live in times of laxer control over public expenditure—as was made obvious by the figures that the Chancellor gave us a few weeks ago.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): I think that the right hon. Gentleman is suffering from a slight shortage of memory. He was in the Treasury when the Chancellor, now Lord Healey, introduced his Budget in 1975 or 1976. In that, as in today's Red Book, there was a carry-forward of anticipated expenditure for a number of years ahead. That led to an expected PSBR of many billions of pounds and caused great concern to those of us in opposition at that time. No doubt at that time the right hon. Gentleman defended the multiannual PSBR, the deficit on planned Government expenditure that was shown up in the Red Book. At heart, the right hon. Gentleman is a sensible man and knows that Governments enter into expenditure programmes that will run for some years. The multiannual programme is simply a forecast of the likely outturn over future years. The right hon. Gentleman must remember that from his years at the Treasury. The Treasury may have been lax in those days, too, when, as far as I remember, he was one of its more spendthrift members.

Mr. Davies: We certainly had many Budgets; it was a kind of multibudget era. But we had only one PSBR each year and we carried very few things forward. The Financial Secretary says that multiannual means carrying forward or rolling forward. At least he has explained what is meant by multiannual programmes.

Mr. Rowlands: The multiannual programme in this article has the specific purpose of achieving economic and monetary union. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the major purposes of the Red Book was to achieve economic and monetary union?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is right. I was coming to that issue, because the Red Book is intended to ensure the lasting convergence—not just a one-off convergence—that is necessary for the achievement of economic and monetary union.

The Financial Secretary got into some difficulty, which may have been due to the lateness of the hour, when he was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) what the Prime Minister meant when he told The Irish Times that he was in favour of economic and monetary union as it would put us at the heart of Europe and all that. The Financial Secretary wriggled. He said, "Ah, well, of course there are all kinds of economic and monetary union." He nods, but perhaps he is tired. He did not mention the hard ecu, but it was the sort of 13th currency that the Treasury and some guy in the City dreamt up to try to get out of this nonsense. It was a rather clever idea, but, unfortunately, nobody bought it.

There may be all sorts of economic and monetary unions, but this one cannot be interpreted flexibly, whatever else has been interpreted in that way. The Financial Secretary shakes his head again. What other economic and monetary union can it be? If I were debating some other economic and monetary union I should be called to order. I am debating this one. In effect, it is monetary union because I do not know what economic union means. Monetary union is quite clear. We are told that the Red Book is intended to ensure the lasting convergence that is necessary for the achievement of economic and monetary union.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on elucidating an issue that seems to have been missed by every hon. Member and certainly by the media. It is that propositions in the Bill have already been adopted into the practices of our budgeting structure. Another little item in the Budget caused some consternation and bamboozlement. It was VAT on fuel. That is the adoption of the concept of harmonisation of VAT because most member states have VAT on fuel and we will have a great deal more put on it before we see the end of that impost.

8 am

Mr. Davies: I had better be careful not to go down that particular road.

The Financial Secretary is studying the text of the treaty carefully, for which I am grateful. The Attorney-General has left—frankly, I do not blame him.

The multiannual programme must have regard to price stability. We are back to that again. The Government are doing all right with price stability at the moment, at 1·5 per cent. or 2 per cent., or 3 per cent. depending on whether it is the underlying rate. Perhaps next year, when the subsequent multiannual programme is published, the Financial Secretary will not be doing so well with price stability. I suspect that the pass has been sold and the Prime Minister realises that the British economic system needs inflation. We will return to that debate another time.

Article 109e states that the multiannual programme exists

"for the achievement of economic and monetary union, in particular with regard to sound public finances".

That is a bit of a joke, with a £50 billion PSBR at 8·2 per cent. of GDP. That particular multiannual programme does not come anywhere near "sound public finances".

I do not think that next year's multiannual programme will do so, either. Will it be different, or does the current programme apply for three years? We have been given some Mickey Mouse figures that are supposed to allow forecasting of the PSBR for next year and the year after. I seem to remember that it was difficult to forecast on Friday the PSBR for Monday, let alone for three years ahead.

Sadly, whatever the Financial Secretary may say about his rolling programmes and the sophistication of public expenditure control—or the lack of it these days—the Government are not doing very well. There will be real problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East mentioned flexibility. There is little flexibility in the treaty's provisions. The figure must fall and continue to fall to about 3·5 per cent. before too long—and that requirement must be observed because it is a treaty obligation. It is not an opt-out or opt-in. It must be done now, or at least when the treaty is ratified.

The Government claim that they will meet that obligation. They say, "We are all in favour of bringing down the PSBR. We will have a balanced budget." The figure must fall to 3 per cent. because the stage 2 obligation is to bring it as close to 3 per cent. as they can.

Paragraph 3 states that many of the provisions

"shall apply from the beginning of the second stage."

It is suggested that there is a cut-off point between stages 2 and 3, when we can sit back as though nothing happened at stage 2. The Financial Secretary offered an explanation earlier. Apparently, the House is to be given a marvellous choice—unlike the Messina conference, the British people and the House will have a marvellous choice, some time in the future, on whether they want to take a decision, unfettered and uncluttered by anything that has gone before, to go for a single currency and—dare I say it?—economic and monetary union.

It will not be like that, because stage 2 runs into stage 3—and the transitional provisions run into stage 2. It used to be said of nuclear strategy that it was a seamless web. When Ministers found themselves in difficulty over the nuclear deterrent—I am sure that the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), as a former Chief Whip and Foreign Office Minister remembers this—the stock phrase was "a seamless web". Well, this is almost a seamless web. By the time we get to stage 3, the web will have spun all around us by stage 2. But I see that the former Chief Whip is itching to intervene.

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman has egged me on to my feet.

In my interesting days as Chief Whip, or Patronage Secretary, I cannot recall hearing either the Labour party or the Conservative party described as a seamless web. It strikes me as an extraordinarily inapt description. I should have thought that both our parties were more like spiders' webs, full of little traps from which hon. Members appear. Does the right hon. Gentleman regard his party as a seamless web in regard to the issue of the Maastricht treaty? Far from it, I should have thought.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman is not on his best form this morning—or perhaps I did not explain properly. I was using the phrase "seamless web" to describe the whole process of the deterrent, from the little shells that nearly blew up Germany to the big ones that blew up the world. The right hon. Gentleman was a disarmament Minister, but I remember being on a television programme with him during the Reykjavik summit: he had not a clue what was going on and nor had I. I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman learnt very much in the Foreign Office.

Dr. Godman: My right hon. Friend quoted paragraph 3, which states that paragraphs 1, 9, 11 and 14 of article 104c are excluded from the second stage. Does he agree that some powerful sanctions still exist—for example, in paragraph 8 of article 104c—which can be levied against a recalcitrant member state? Cannot a Council censure such a state in public? That could be disastrous, in an election year, for the governing party that is being so censured.

Mr. Davies: Indeed. I was coming to article 104c. My hon. Friend is right: some of the more draconian paragraphs are excluded until stage 3 is reached—paragraphs 1, 9, 11 and 14. Paragraph 3, however, states:

"If a Member State does not fulfil the requirements under one or both of these criteria"— the ratio criteria, which we have debated—

"the Commission shall prepare a report."

[Mr. Davies]

That is pretty fierce in itself.

"The report of the Commission shall also take into account whether the government deficit exceeds government investment expenditure and take into account all other relevant factors".

That is the starting point. Then, as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) pointed out, if the nation state fails to do certain things, the Commission can publish the report. Under paragraph 12, it is held in terrorem over the head of the member state.

No member state—least of all a member state like Britain, which will probably have a balance of payments problem and whose currency will be rather wobbly—will want to incur such international opprobrium, with all the attendant effects on the international markets, the pound or interest rates. The report would be like an IMF report—the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex can tease me about that again if he likes. We know the effect that the IMF can have on a nation's status in the currency and financial markets.

Paragraph 4 of chapter 4 states:

"In the second stage, Member States shall endeavour to avoid excessive government deficits."

The Financial Secretary does not even look up. The word used is "endeavour", but the whole area encompasses pressure on the member state to ensure that it avoids excessive deficits.

Mr. Rowlands: Before my right hon. Friend deals with paragraph 4 of article 109e, let us consider the second part of paragraph 3, which lists a series of articles that will apply from the beginning of stage 3. At the beginning of his speech, my right hon. Friend mentioned the formula used by the Law Officers and the Foreign Secretary. They identified the articles and amendments that were necessary and those which were only desirable. They said that one category created rights and obligations. Is it my right hon. Friend's understanding that some of the articles listed in the second part of paragraph 3, relating to stage 3, are not necessary and, therefore, do not create rights and obligations at this stage and are thus only desirable? If so, could not some easily be knocked out of the Bill without preventing ratification?

Mr. Davies: That follows on from what I have tried to argue. The second part of paragraph 3 deals with articles which will apply from the beginning of stage 3. It could be knocked out without affecting ratification of the treaty. That must be right and I am sure that the Financial Secretary agrees.

Mr. Cash: In the same spirit of scrutiny, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would be as well to remember that we are talking about a legal requirement? The requirement for member states to "endeavour" to avoid excessive Government deficits under paragraph 4 of article 190e is, to all intents and purposes, no different from the requirement under the so-called opt-out in article 104c, of which much has been made, that member states "shall" avoid excessive Government deficits. The important point is that, if member states do not avoid such deficits, they will be up before the beak.

Mr. Davies: That is right. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the phrase "shall endeavour to avoid" appears in many contractual documents: "the party of the third part shall endeavour to avoid". If it can be shown that the party of the third part has not endeavoured to avoid, damages, fines, or whatever the document specifies, follow. However, we shall endeavour. Every day, the Financial Secretary "endeavours to avoid" at the Treasury. We heard that the Belgian Government had been endeavouring to avoid, although they did not manage it and lost a Prime Minister. They will try again because they will have to. Everyone is endeavouring to avoid.

I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, who appears to think that there is flexibility and that we do not have to worry. Everyone will be endeavouring to avoid and will endeavour to reach the 3 per cent. target as fast as they can, especially, and paradoxically, as the economic situation in Europe gets worse. It will drive member states towards economic and monetary union faster because that will be regarded as the panacea—get there quickly and everything will be all right. I suspect that it will work in a different direction.

The Financial Secretary is endeavouring. There will be another Red Book next year and he will ensure that the Commission does not come down on him like a ton of bricks. He will be a good boy and do the best he can.

Mr. Legg: I was interested in the right hon. Gentleman's comments about nation states in Europe wishing to go faster, even though economic circumstances were against them. I recently had a meeting with Pedro Perez, the socialist Economics Minister of Spain, where there is an unemployment rate of 20 per cent. He said that Spain had a convergence programme to get its public sector borrowing requirement down to 1 per cent. He saw the solution to Spain's unemployment problem as the driving down of the deficit. The right hon. Gentleman has hit on a very good point.

Mr. Davies: I wish to move on, but I agree that Governments will try to reach the 3 per cent. target as quickly as they can because they will be under pressure. Now that the ERM has failed to deliver economic and monetary union, because it could not traverse the chasm in one leap—it tried to do it in two leaps but fell down—there will be pressure to arrive at a common currency in another way, like a big bang, and everyone will have to converge as fast as they can. I think that that is what will happen, but it is a matter of opinion.

I shall now move on.

Mr. Hain: In support of that important point, may I remind my right hon. Friend of the statement by the Economics Commissioner, Mr. Henning Christophersen? My right hon. Friend may recall that a few weeks ago there was much speculation about the "impossibilist" convergence criteria. Countries were finding them difficult to meet; in fact, virtually no country was meeting them. Mr. Christophersen quickly jumped in to say that that did not mean that Europe was not still on course:

"We are not talking about a delay in the general process. We are talking about a common time frame."

That was an important confirmation from the EC Commissioner.

Mr. Livingstone: And on the same point, does my right hon. Friend——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. We cannot have one intervention upon another.

8.15 am

Mr. Davies: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain). I, too, saw Mr. Christophersen's statement. It was rather a diplomatic statement, because I gather that different views were expressed at the meeting and the Commissioner may have been trying to straddle those different views. I believe that in general there will be an effort to get the process over with as quickly as possible.

Mr. Livingstone: One the same point, in view of what the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) has just said about the attitude of the Spanish Government, does not a clearer idea of what is likely to happen emerge from the first stage of the French election results? The French Government, also misguided, have striven to prepare the French economy for the criteria and have followed every stricture on monetary policy that comes out of Brussels, to try to make France the premier nation in terms of preparation for monetary union. The result has been the destruction of popular support for that Government and their elimination from Parliament. The results have been devastating, the worst showing by any French Government this century, and that is because that Government have complied so faithfully with the criteria. After the best part of a decade and a half in the first stage of the transition towards monetary union—that is what the exchange rate mechanism was all about—popular support has been destroyed, because the scale of pain involved is not sustainable in a democracy.

Mr. Davies: It will be interesting to see what happens in France and whether the Gaullists will try to break the orthodoxy. I should be surprised if they did. I think that the Governments of Europe are all locked into it and that after a while they will not worry too much about their people. Perhaps I am digressing now, but I believe that there is a kind of political class that likes to latch on to that orthodoxy. I should be surprised if the Gaullists did otherwise, but I may be wrong.

May I now move on?

Mr. Gould: May I delay my right hon. Friend for a moment longer? Bearing in mind the powerful point made by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West about the Spanish experience, the even more powerful point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) about the fate of the French socialist Government, and the fact that one of the few positive arguments for supporting the treaty ever advanced by our hon. Friends is that we must maintain and establish solidarity with our European socialist colleagues, does not my right hon. Friend think that it would be advisable for our hon. Friends at least to note the fate of the French socialist Government and the likely fate of the Spanish socialist Government? Even in terms of the most cynical electoral calculation, would not it be prudent to pause for a moment before blundering forward along the same course?

Mr. Davies: I agree. Indeed, about 30 of us recently went through the Aye Lobby to ask for a pause, but unfortunately I do not know where the rest of the Labour party was. Perhaps other Labour Members were in bed, or perhaps they did not want to pause—that must be the conclusion to draw. I agree that what my hon. Friend has described is a serious matter, not only for the so-called democratic left in Europe but for orthodox parties of the right, too. We are taking economics out of politics, which is a dangerous thing to do. No doubt we can return to that debate.

Article 109e (5) which deals with the Bank of England, says:

"During the second stage, each Member State shall, as appropriate, start the process leading to the independence of its central bank in accordance with Article 108."

That is a legal obligation. The second stage starts on 1 January 1994 and goes on and on until we reach a third stage. Presumably, if we do not reach a third stage, we shall remain in the second stage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East questioned the Financial Secretry once or twice on this matter and the Financial Secretary was not entirely clear about it. I think that he said, and I have heard other Ministers say, that we do not have to do anything about the Bank of England until the third stage—until we have opted in, if we decide to opt in. That is as it may be, but something has to be done by a member state, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East pointed out, to "start the process leading to the independence of its central bank".

What is meant by the "independence of its central bank"

is that the statute governing that central bank must be as nearly identical as possible to the statute governing the European central bank, which is also independent. It makes sense that they should be mirror images, like the German länder banks and the Bundesbank. The process has to be started.

The Bank of England Act 1946 did not nationalise the Bank of England. I heard Lord Jay making a number of speeches explaining that Act quite clearly. It merely enabled the Treasury to issue directives to compel the Bank of England to obey. Apart from once, over prices and incomes policy, when those at the Bank went off and paid themselves a lot of money, I do not think that the Bank has ever been threatened or issued with a directive. We were contemplating one in those days, but, in the end, it did not have to happen. So now there are directives held in reserve. If the Governor refuses to put on his top hat, get in his car and come down to No. 10 Downing street and give his advice on interest rates, a directive will be issued.

The Bank of England Act will have to be substantially changed or repealed. The power to issue directives against the Bank of England will have to go. I should be surprised if that could be done by order. I do not see how it can be done except by repealing the Act.

Mr. Dorrell rose——

Mr. Davies: I see that the Financial Secretary is ready to intervene. How does he envisage starting the process, which he will have to do in stage 2?

Mr. Dorrell: This country has no obligation under the treaty to move to stage 3. That is a choice which we have left until later. Furthermore, clause 2 provides that we would not be able to exercise our option of moving to stage 2 without a further piece of legislation going through the House. Clearly, as part of that legislative process, we should have to provide for an independent central bank which satisfied the terms of the treaty—if we chose to go to a single currency. We should have to provide arrangements for the Bank of England which satisfied the treaty, if we chose to exercise our option under our protocol. But if we choose not to exercise our option in order to join a single currency, we are under no obligation under the treaty to change the arrangements for the Bank of England.

Mr. Davies: Is the Financial Secretary saying that he does not start the process under stage 2 until just before the Queen signs the Act?

Mr. Cash: It is idiotic.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) says that it is idiotic. As a statute is required to go through the House to make the changes to the Bank of England that are necessary to satisfy the requirements of the treaty, it seems to me not unreasonable to assume that the House would wish to consider the arrangements for the Bank of England at the same time as it made the choice whether to adopt a single currency. It would put the two things together. [Interruption.] With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, it is not beyond the wit of man to fix a date on which a measure comes into force somewhat after the date of Royal Assent.

Mr. Davies: The Government will do the two at more or less the same time. We have not been told that before, so now we can move on. Of course, it means that the Government do not believe in an independent Bank of England. The present British set-up is excellent; the Governor gives his advice, and the Prime Minister and Chancellor decide. The French have had a similar system for years, although I do not think that they bother to consult the Governor, who is told of the decision, whatever it is, after it has been taken. By that means, the French have done well—better than the Germans—on inflation. We note with interest that the Government are not rushing to create the great independent central bank, which we shall have to accept if we go for the idea.

Mr. Gould: My right hon. Friend is perhaps being too generous to the Financial Secretary, who said that no step need be taken towards the establishment of an independent central bank unless and until the preconditions for the implementation of stage 3 are acted on. Yet that is contradicted by the words that my right hon. Friend quoted. They provide that under stage 2—the question whether we ever get to stage 3 is irrelevant—each member state shall—it is a mandatory use of language—start the process, leading to the establishment of the independent central bank. So my right hon. Friend was right to ask what steps the Government contemplate to fulfil that obligation. It has nothing to do with stage 3. We may never reach that stage, but that mandatory obligation would be in force as we proceeded through stage 2.

Mr. Davies: I am prepared to give the Financial Secretary the benefit of the doubt. I think he was saying that, for a magical moment, we shall be in stage 2, and then —whoosh—into stage 3. If he was not saying that, my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is right.

Mr. Rowlands: If the Financial Secretary believes that this is the right process—that we can legislate for stage 3 when we come to the second piece of legislation—why are we putting so many articles into our domestic legislation now? If that formula is available in that case, why is it not available for other articles in stage 3, so that we can legislate for that stage when we decide to go into it?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes a good point, which has not so far been answered, except that what the Government are doing is tidy and makes the draftsmen happy. Of course, doing it this way avoids a terrible row, since our European colleagues will not have to accuse us of dragging our feet.

Mr. Legg: Should there be a prolonged period in stage 2 for the United Kingdom, and we have the provision stating that we shall start the process, will the decision to start the process be wholly in our hands? If Britain does not take that step in accordance with the treaty, other parties may apply pressure to get that part of the treaty enforced.

Mr. Davies: From a practical point of view, the answer is yes, something will have to be done. But it will all be done after the treaty has been ratified by joining the ERM —a subject to which I shall return.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government want to face in both directions simultaneously. They want to be able to say that the second stage can stretch ahead indefinitely, with the rest of Europe perhaps in stage 3, just as our proceedings today are actually taking place on Wednesday in parliamentary terms, even though Thursday Committees may soon start sitting. On the other hand, we must put every condition in place so that the Government can satisfy other European countries—and some of the Financial Secretary's other friends—that we will be in a position to satisfy the requirements of the treaty. The Government do not want to say which course of action they will take.

8.30 am

Mr. Davies: I will not be tempted too far. All the geniuses are on the Government Front Bench.

I shall refer to another institution. The number of institutions established by the European Community is amazing. There are institutions for all sorts of purposes. Article 109f provides for the European Monetary Institute. The Government's involvement must start at the beginning. The institution must be set up and the Government must be part of it immediately at the start of stage 2—which is 1 January, if everything goes all right. Basically, the EMI will be the shadow central bank. It will take over from the Committee of Governors, which already exists.

The process is clear: we have an obligation under the treaty, and we will obviously take a full part in the EMI. The statute of the EMI is set out in page 104 of the treaty. There are only one or two points to which I should refer. Paragraph 1.3 in article 1 of the protocol says:

> "The Committee of Governors and the European Monetary Co-operation Fund (EMCF) shall be dissolved. All assets and liabilities of the EMCF shall pass automatically to the EMI."

I do not know what the European monetary co-operation fund is. Perhaps the Financial Secretary could tell us what assets the fund has at present, what its liabilities are and what percentage of the assets—or perhaps more importantly, the liabilities—Her Majesty's Government own or for which money is owed. All the assets and liabilities will go to the EMI. Presumably, the fund passes out to the joint ownership of the British Government to some extent and comes under the ownership of the EMI, which then becomes the central bank. I hope that the Financial Secretary can clarify that matter.

In article 2, we are told the objectives of the EMI:

"The EMI shall contribute to the realization of the conditions necessary for the transition to the third stage of Economic and Monetary Union".

It is not any old economic and monetary union, but the one provided for in the treaty. The Financial Secretary does not know whether we want to join that union.

An institution will be set up, perhaps on 1 January 1994. Its job will be to prepare the way for the central bank. The British Government will have to play their full part. Whatever money or effort it costs, and whether the Financial Secretary likes it or not, the Government will be part of an enterprise which will drive the countries of Europe towards a central bank, a single currency and economic and monetary union.

The article says that the EMI will make "preparations required for the establishment of the European System of Central Banks (ESCB), and for the conduct of a single monetary policy"— the Government will be playing a full part at the heart of the institution in Europe—

"and the creation of a single currency in the third stage."

The Financial Secretary or the governors will also oversee the development of the ecu, which will presumably be the single currency.

Mr. Rowlands: The hard ecu.

Mr. Davies: We lost the hard ecu somewhere along the way. I do not know what happened to it. Given the balance of payments deficit and the PSBR, we cannot talk about hard currencies. So to propose a hard ecu is perhaps not a good idea for the Government.

Mr. Legg: A marshmallow ecu.

Mr. Davies: A marshmallow ecu, the hon. Gentleman says.

Article 3 of the protocol says:

"The EMI shall act in accordance with the objectives and principles stated in Article 2 of the Statute of the ESCB."

Then we are told what its primary tasks will be. I will not go through them all.

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend mentioned that the EMI would have to act in accordance with the objectives and principles stated in article 2 of the ESCB statute. If my right hon. Friend turns to page 90, he will find that the treaty lays down that the EMI will be directed to achieve price stability in a determined, laser-like fashion, in accordance with article 3a. So we have come full circle. Although supposedly we are not yet in stage 3 and the House will take a free decision to enter it, in practice we are lining ourselves up lock, stock and barrel to worship at the shrine of price stability at all costs and without prejudice to anything else.

Mr. Davies: That is right. As I said at the beginning of my speech, price stability appears in paragraph 2 of the transitional provisions. It appears right through the treaty. As the Financial Secretary accepted in another debate, price stability is close to zero inflation, if not zero inflation. That is what it is all about. We are told in paragraph 4.1 of the protocol that the EMI will "normally be consulted by the national monetary authorities before they take decisions on the course of monetary policy in the context of the common framework for ex ante co-ordination."

That means that, even under stage 2, the British Government will no longer be free to set their own monetary targets and determine how they control monetary policy. The EMI will be able to come to the Government and say, "We want to look at your monetary targets. How do you do it?" The job of the EMI is to create a common monetary policy for when stage 3 arrives. It will be ready to take over with the M3, M4, M10 or whatever totem pole of monetarism is in fashion when we reach the first stage of EMU.

Mr. Spearing: My right hon. Friend will agree with me that we have dealt with profound issues in the last two debates. Our problem is in describing them to those who are not habitually interested in international banking matters. Does he agree that what he has just described amounts to saying that, in stage 3, we are invited to enter a series of financial and economic straitjackets? However, in stage 2 we are not in the jackets, but we have to act as if we are.

Therefore, when we reach stage 2, we shall be told by whatever Government are in power that we can easily move to stage 3, because we shall not have to act any differently. That is perhaps a rather crude analogy. Is it not approximately the position in which the treaty and the matters referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) put us? Therefore, when the time comes for choice, it will be easier superficially for the Government or any Administration to say that we should enter stage 3 so that we can influence future events.

Mr. Davies: I quoted the last sentence of paragraph 4.1 of the protocol, but, as my hon. Friend has said, some of the sentences are stronger and bolder. One of them talks about strengthening "the co-ordination of the monetary policies of the Member States with the aim of ensuring price stability;"

Another states that regular consultations must be held on "the use of monetary policy instruments".

I would not want to stretch the point, but that is getting pretty close to interest rates which are part of monetary control. Towards the end, there is a requirement to "supervise the technical preparation of ECU bank notes".

I do not know whether that means painting the name on them, but perhaps in Birmingham where they used to print pound notes they will be printing ecus.

The British Government are tied in by treaty obligations to do all those things, yet they have to pretend that, one day in the distant future, a pristine, unfettered, uncluttered decision will be taken to go in or to stay out. The Government are not credible when they say that; we are in pretty deep, and if we do not have the courage to cut this Gordian knot and say that it is all nonsense, we shall not have the courage to do it in five or six years' time, when we are all sitting nicely on our EMIs and other institutions, rushing back and forth from Brussels for splendid meetings. I do not believe that it will happen like that.

Mr. Chisholm: Is it not also the case that all the references to monetary policy must include exchange rate policy? Does not that give the lie to the idea that Ministers are peddling, in order to gain the votes of Conservative Back Benchers, that they will retain the freedom to set the exchange rate during stage 2? Is it not the case that we shall not be able to have a floating exchange rate and that that will be controlled, or at least influenced, by the EMI?

Mr. Davies: Indeed. I shall return to the interesting subject of the ERM. My hon. Friend is quite right.

Article 6.1n, on the European Monetary Institute, talks about a Council regulation 1969/88

"establishing a single facility providing medium-term financial assistance for Member States' balance of payments."

I see the Financial Secretary's eyes lighting up at the chance to get some money out of the Commission to help to cover the Government's huge balance of payments deficit. It was £17 billion this year, and if we have the recovery that the Government want, it will be £20 billion and will continue to rise.

It sounds a bit like the IMF, which was formed to help member states with balance of payments problems. That was its primary task, although I do not know whether that is still the case.

The EMI and the Commission will help out member states with their balance of payments problems, but there will be no free lunch. There will be a multiannual programme which will set out where the cuts should be made and how many hospitals and schools should be closed and whether there should be cuts in social security and welfare payments, which is what they are trying to do in Belgium and Germany, and facing some problems. Taxes will not be cut, as that would not be right, but it will be possible to cut public expenditure. If we want help with the balance of payments, we are going to have to pay the Danegeld.

Article 7 refers rather innocuously to other tasks:

"Once a year, the EMI shall address a report"—

we shall have plenty of institutions and reports going back and forth all the time—

"to the Council on the state of the preparations for the third stage."

That means the state of the preparations of member states, I assume, for the third stage. The report will go to the Council and it will say that the British Government have done nothing at all, apart from issuing a funny little book with a red cover and calling it a multiannual report. It will say that the Financial Secretary is sitting on his backside in the Treasury, doing nothing. And there will be terrible trouble.

But that will not happen, will it? Her Majesty's Treasury is a very law-abiding, responsible and proficient organisation, and we shall be doing our best at the heart of Europe, not like those Italians, dragging their feet, and those terrible Spaniards. We are northern people, Anglo-Saxons, we abide by the law, we do things right, our word is our bond.

Mr. Enright: We are not all Anglo-Saxons; some are Celts.

8.45 am

Mr. Davies: Yes, indeed, some of us are Celts. I was being respectful to my English colleagues who are in a majority in this House.

Nevertheless, we are Anglo-Saxon people, and we have those qualities that Anglo-Saxons are supposed to have, and that means that we will abide by the law. So we will be preparing it, working at it, doing all the things, getting the convergence going; and the report, no doubt, will be quite a good one in that sense. We will get lots of marks for effort. Maybe we will not always get our sums right, and sometimes the figures will be far out, say, on the public sector borrowing requirement, but at least we will be working hard at it, and that again will be the reality.

Article 7 goes on to say,

"These reports shall include an assessment of the progress towards convergence . . . and cover in particular the adaptation of monetary policy instruments"— back to those monetary policy instruments again; they love them—

"and the preparation of the procedures necessary for carrying out a single monetary policy in the third stage"— so there will have to be preparation of procedures ready for the third stage—

"as well as the statutory requirement to be fulfilled for national central banks"—

oh yes, missed that—

"as well as the statutory requirements to be fulfilled for national central banks to become an integral part of the ESCB."

The Financial Secretary has not seen that, has he? It is on page 106. He has it.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that section 4 of the Bank of England Act 1946 is the exclusive basis upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and therefore the voters of this country are able to give directions to the Governor of the Bank of England. The provision that the hon. Gentleman has just mentioned, in article 7.1 and article 8 of the protocol—which I do not want to pre-empt but which deals with whether the Governor of the Bank of England, in that EMI, can seek or take instructions from the Treasury—blows the whole thing wide open. Not only have they to set up this bank, but they will have to repeal section 4 to make sense of it.

Mr. Davies: I do not know about that, but certainly article 8 mentions—it is the same article about independence as we find in the central bank protocol——

Mr. Dorrell: I think that there is a fundamental misunderstanding. The first sentence of article 8 reads:

"The members of the Council of the EMI"—

the national central bank governors—

"who are the representatives of their institutions shall, with respect to their activities, act according [to] their own responsibilities."

That means according to their existing responsibilities as defined by their existing national law. [HON. MEMBERS: "Read on."] The article then goes on:

"In exercising the powers and performing the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty and this Statute, the Council of the EMI may not seek or take any instructions from Community institutions or bodies or governments of Member States."

The key point about the second sentence of article 8 is that it is the Council of the EMI as an institution which is not allowed to take instructions. The members of the Council, acting as individual members of the Council, do so on their own responsibility. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] That is what that article means. It is no good hon. Members saying, "Come on"; that is the meaning of the article. I concede that the article is not the model of clarity of other articles in the treaty, which is why I intervened at an early stage to enable the House to proceed on the basis of a correct understanding of it.

Mr. Davies: I paid the Financial Secretary a compliment earlier this morning, saying that—unlike the Minister of State, Foreign Office—he does not rush in to give legal opinions on the hoof. [Interruption.] I hope that he did not ask the legal advisers at the Foreign Office—or did he? I hope that he did not ask the Treasury Solicitor, either.

Mr. Gould: I hope that I shall not embarrass the Financial Secretary, or anyone else, by revealing that, a long time ago, I taught him international and constitutional law. I disclaim all responsibility for what he has just said.

Mr. Davies: Some of us do not consider international and constitutional law to be law. As far as some of us are concerned, looking at the words is the law.

The Financial Secretary has an acute mind, and as he read on he started to wobble and to worry a bit. For a start, the article is headed "Independence", and a judge would be quite impressed with that.

Mr. Spearing: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it will not be international and constitutional law, but law as interpreted by the European Court of Justice, in respect of the treaty, which is quite a different matter? Is it not probable that that court may say that it is true that one must not influence that body, as a body, and that that also means that one must not try to influence its members, because in so doing one is trying to influence the body. Although I would not say that that is my interpretation, or that of the court, surely it is just as logical and likely as the interpretation given by the Financial Secretary.

Mr. Davies: The way that I read the article is that, when exercising their duties, whoever sits on the Council—presumably it will be the Governor of the Bank of England—will be subject to the Bank of England Act 1946. However, in exercising duties as a member of the EMI, the Governor must not take any instructions from anyone.

Mr. Dorrell indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: The Financial Secretary shakes his head, but that is a perfectly reasonable interpretation of what may not be an easy article. I suggest that, within the context of both the EMI and the central bank, and the thrust of the independence of those institutions, the European Court might be more likely to accept my interpretation than that of the Financial Secretary.

Mr. Dorrell: I concede that, even if I had been privy to the advice of my former tutor, I think that I would have had some difficulty in interpreting the article on my own. The interpretation that I placed on the two sentences that I quoted is given extra authority when I tell the House that the first sentence of the article is lifted directly from the present terms of reference of the Committee of Governors of the central banks. As far as I know, no one argues that, when acting as members of that committee, they are required to be independent of their national accountability mechanisms.

Mr. Davies: Maybe not—perhaps it is a looser institution and the article is referring to something more precise, but it is still headed "Independence". However I do not want to labour the point.

Mr. Legg: In saying that, because certain phraseology is taken from previous legislation and treaties, it must have the same interpretation as before, the Treasury has misinterpreted some areas of the treaty. The Government Front-Bench spokesman seemed to miss the point: that the phrases have been lifted and put into the Maastricht treaty in a different context, which adds a different interpretation and weight to the words involved.

Mr. Davies: I am sure that that is right.

Mr. Bill Walker: The right hon. Gentleman might cast his eye a little further down the page. The presidency of the EMI is a full-time job for three years. That must have an impact on the decisions of the EMI.

Mr. Davies: As I read the provision, there are different spheres of responsibility. It may be that the two circles will occasionally cross, creating something of a problem. So far as I can see, in the exercise of the duties in respect of the EMI, which may very well be different from those relating to the Bank of England, the Governor will be independent.

Mr. Hain: I should like to direct my right hon. Friend's attention to two sentences that the Financial Secretary was very reluctant to read out. These are identical to the wording of article 7 on page 91, which specifically details the independence criteria governing the European central bank. I should think that the court will take note of that.

Mr. Davies: The Financial Secretary shakes his head again, but my reading is the same as that of my hon. Friend.

Article 23 provides—hooray, hooray—for the liquidation of the EMI. Unfortunately, the institution appears again in another form—the more powerful central bank. I am sorry to come back to the question of assets and liabilities, but I must do so. All the assets and liabilities of the EMI will automatically pass to the central bank. They started with the Co-ordinating Committee of European Governors, then went to the EMI, and are now to go to the European central bank. Article 29 of the bank's statute deals with the capital subscription—the weighting of voting of shareholders. I suppose that one can subscribe to things other than shares.

I do not understand this article, and I should not criticise the Financial Secretary for failing to understand it. It says:

"Each national central bank shall be assigned a weighting in this key which shall be equal to the sum of:

—50 per cent. of the share of its respective Member State in the population of the Community in the penultimate year preceding the establishment if the ESCB:

—50 per cent. of the share of its respective Member State in the gross domestic product at market prices of the Community as recorded in the last five years preceding the penultimate year before the establishment of the ESCB".

As if that were not enough, the percentages have to be rounded up to the nearest multiple of 0·05 percentage points. That is an exam question in itself.

Presumably some of the value of these assets that have been transferred twice is ours. How does this work out in terms of ownership? Presumably the bank is the owner. There is nothing in this provision about 24 votes for the larger states and 11 votes for the smaller states. There is nothing about weighted voting. Perhaps the Financial Secretary, when he intervenes, will try to explain the meaning of article 29. What will the United Kingdom own, if we own anything, in the European central bank? Will it have those assets which belonged to it initially, passed through all the institutions? Will we have one third, one tenth, one fifth of the assets?

Mr. Rowlands: Article 29 has been puzzling me for some time. Unlike our vote on the Council, which is a simple matter to work out, it is almost impossible to work out the article 29 formula, which changes according to one's economic performance. Will the Financial Secretary tell us what percentage of the total number of members or votes on the new ECB—were we establishing it today—we would have based on our current economic and GDP performance?

9 am

Mr. Davies: I am sure that the Financial Secretary has heard the question.

Article 109f.2 states that the EMI shall co-ordinate monetary policy, aim at price stability and monitor the function of the EMS. The article also states:

"For the preparation of the third stage, the EMI shall:

—prepare the instruments"

of monetary policy.

Paragraph 4 of the article on page 26 states:

"The EMI, acting by a majority of two thirds of the members of its Council, may" carry out three functions. Presumably, on that basis, each member has one vote.

Mr. Livingstone: Are not the votes weighted to reflect the GDP? Per head of population, the German vote will be worth twice the vote of Great Britain.

Mr. Davies: Even Luxembourg may not do too badly in terms of number of votes.

Paragraph 4 states:

"The EMI, acting by a majority of two thirds of the members of its Council, may:

—formulate opinions or recommendations on the overall orientation of monetary policy"—— we have had that policy before, but not in that form——

"and exchange rate policy".

Another sphere has been opened up. We are dealing not only with monetary policy, but with exchange rate policy —I suppose that we cannot have one without the other.

The EMI must act on a majority of two thirds. I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to sit on the Governor to ensure that he votes, or whether the article on independence will be applied. I do not know where the references to the exchange rate policy leave a British Government who are not really part of the ERM. While we are, presumably, part of the EMS, we are not part of the ERM. The monetary system is nonsense; it is the ERM that is important.

Mr. Dorrell: The easiest way of responding to the right hon. Gentleman is to refer him to article 3 of the protocol of the EMI. It clearly states:

"The EMI shall carry out the tasks and functions conferred upon it by the Treaty and this Statute without prejudice to the responsibility of the competent authorities for the conduct of the monetary policy within the respective Member States."

Monetary responsibility remains the responsibility of the member states during the time that the EMI is operating.

Mr. Davies: The Chancellor will be able to sit on the Governor and tell him what to do.

Mr. Gould: Article 109j provides that the duties laid on the EMI by the statute—the words quoted by the Financial Secretary—include the responsibilities of monitoring performance on exchange rates and monetary matters as laid down by our membership of the ERM.

Mr. Davies: Even if the Governor puts up his hand to vote in the way that the Chancellor wants, if two thirds vote the other way, we shall be outvoted. It is qualified majority voting and they can formulate opinions and make recommendations. It states:

"The EMI, acting by a majority of two thirds of the . . . members may . . . formulate . . . recommendations on the overall orientation of monetary policy and exchange rate policy as well as on related measures in each Member State."

It will be able to pronounce on exchange rate policy on a two thirds vote, and that might be contrary to the wishes of the Governor who would, according to the Financial Secretary, take his instructions from the Chancellor.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Does the right hon. Gentleman think that it would be rather good if we needed a two thirds majority in this country in order to make such decisions?

Mr. Davies: What decisions where?

Sir Russell Johnston: The decisions that the right hon. Gentleman has just read out. A two thirds majority is required to set in train those various propositions. He criticised that, and I said that it would be rather nice if that was necessary in this country.

Mr. Davies: Some measures need a two-thirds majority, and others need a simple majority. One cannot give a blanket answer about that. I am not criticising it: I am just reading it out. Euro-enthusiasts have very thin skin. When one reads out the treaty, they say that one is criticising it, and when it is read out again, they say, "Well, it doesn't mean that at all." When it is read out again, they say that it is not there at all. It is like the sub-atomic particles, quarks or whatever they are called, that are seen only when one looks for them. Apparently they are all over this treaty.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the best majority would be by a referendum on this whole wretched treaty? Bearing in mind that, tonight and every night, the Liberals will maintain the balance of power, if they really want a referendum they could obtain one.

Mr. Davies: That is a good point.

Mr. Livingstone: Has my right hon. Friend seen the statement reported on the tapes, that the Liberal democrats have decided to make progress on this? They are outraged by the time that it is taking, and have given undertakings to the Tory Whips that the votes will be delivered day by day to ensure that the treaty is carried? Those are the people who will hawk themselves around Newbury saying that they are there to defend local people when they are propping up the Government and the treaty.

Mr. Davies: That does not surprise me at all. I have been in Parliament longer than my hon. Friend, and I know what to expect from the Liberal party in these matters.

Article 109h deals with balance of payments, and I suppose that it gives some hope to the Financial Secretary of some money to sort out the huge balance of payments deficit. Obviously, strings will be attached. Article 109j deals with convergence conditions. Curiously—or perhaps not curiously—those conditions are set out in the part that deals with the second stage. I suppose that that has to be done like that, so that one knows what they are to get to the third stage. I shall not ask the Financial Secretary for a legal opinion, because I do not think that I am on a good legal point.

I am a little worried that all the convergence criteria are in a second stage, which imposes on us a treaty obligation. I do not want to press that too far, but all four criteria are in the second stage, which says that we must do this and that. There seems to be an obligation on us to achieve a high degree of price stability in stage 2. Is there such an obligation? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] The people's court says yes. I do not know what the lawyers will say.

Mr. Dorrell: One of the earlier, over-arching articles commits us to the achievement of price stability as the condition precedent—in the Government's view and based on our experience over a long period—to the achievement of the growth and social objectives that we all share.

Mr. Davies: I know that the Financial Secretary is keen on price stability. That is a good thing. When he began answering, he gave me the impression that there was a treaty obligation.

Mr. Dorrell: Article 2, which has been much quoted in our discussions, states:

"The Community shall have as its task . . . by implementing the common policies or activities referred to in Articles 3 and 3a, to promote throughout the Community . . . sustainable and non-inflationary growth".

Mr. Davies: That is so, but the Financial Secretary is missing his best point, which is not the flabby language of article 2 but the precise language of article 109j. The Financial Secretary was right the first time. Perhaps he is a little worried now about what he said.

Mr. Dorrell indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: He is not. We will move on to the article's other provisions, which include "the achievement of a high degree of price stability".

That is a good thing, but its achievement is an obligation. Yes? No?

Mr. Dorrell: I quoted where there is an obligation. In the context of article 109j—as I said when I addressed the House in January—the "achievement of a high degree of price stability" is one of the convergence criteria that are not precise treaty obligations. They are conditions precedent on the establishment of a single currency. They are the trap through which a candidate member of the single currency has to pass before it is entitled to join under the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Davies: I do not deny that, but perhaps the Financial Secretary's initial reaction was the better one. Paragraph 1 states also that the report that the EMI make "shall also examine the achievement of a high degree of sustainable convergence"— we had the list before—

"fulfilment by each Member State of the following criteria".

That certainly imposes an obligation to fulful certain criteria in stage 2.

Mr. Rowlands: Presumably, although there is an obligation of some kind on member states, the Government and the Treasury would tender almost a nil return to the Commission and the EMI, because none of those conditions should apply or be enforced unless we decide to go to stage 3. Is the alternative interpretation of the paragraph that we will not have such an opportunity, but will be reported on whether we like it or not?

Mr. Davies: It applies anyway. Whether or not we ever decide to go to a single currency, stage 2 places on the British Government the obligation to do everything they can to achieve zero inflation or something close to it.

Mr. Dorrell: No.

Mr. Davies: Is the Financial Secretary saying that I am wrong?

Mr. Dorrell: I heard the right hon. Gentleman say that article 109j places such an obligation on the United Kingdom. That statement was incorrect, which is why I said, "No."

Mr. Davies: Then on whom does it place that obligation? Nobody?

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Dorrell: I was waiting for the right hon. Gentleman to resume his place, to——

Mr. Davies: Consult the Foreign Secretary's former tutor?

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman asked on whom the obligation in article 109j would be imposed. The obligation is contained in the first sentence of paragraph 1:

"The Commission and the EMI shall report to the Council on the progress made in the fulfilment by the Member States of their obligations regarding the achievement of economic and monetary union."

Those obligations are not imposed by the article but arise way outside it. Article 109j is concerned with the obligation placed on the Commission and the EMI to report to the Council on the achievement or otherwise of convergence criteria by candidate members of the single currency.

Mr. Davies: It is a bit like the article on independence. Article 109j states:

"The Commission and the EMI shall report to the Council on the progress made in the fulfilment by the Member States of their obligations".

"Their" does not refer to the Commission and the EMI, or to the Council; it refers to the member states. The article goes on:

"regarding the achievement of economic and monetary union."

Those obligations are imposed on the member states by treaty under stage 2.

Mr. Dorrell rose——

9.15 am

Mr. Davies: I am sorry; I will not give way to the Financial Secretary again. Perhaps he should get the Attorney-General or someone to give him some better advice.

The criteria are

"the achievement of a high degree of price stability . . . the sustainability of the government financial position; this will be apparent from having achieved a budgetary position without a deficit that is excessive as determined in accordance with Article 104c".

That means getting the deficit down to 3 per cent. It does not mean anything else: that is the obligation imposed on us. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) can wriggle and hope for flexibility as much as he likes—I do not mean that in a pejorative sense.

[Mr. Davies]

This is the criterion that I was really coming to:

"the observance of the normal fluctuation margins provided for by the Exchange Rate Mechanism of the European Monetary System, for at least two years, without devaluing against the currency of any other Member State".

I was a bit dubious when I heard about the opinion given to Conservative Members by someone of the name of Howe; I have not read it, but it sounded a bit political, like the judgments of the European Court. Having read this, however, I am beginning to have second thoughts. Perhaps I did the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) an injustice.

Mr. Betts: Paragraph 1 of article 109j merely refers to the production of reports. It is paragraph 2 that deals with their assessment, and may start to lead on to obligations for Britain. Paragraph 1 of the protocol on the opt-out, further back in the treaty, specifically says:

"The United Kingdom shall notify the Council whether it intends to move to the third stage before the Council makes its assessment under article 109j(2) of this Treaty".

There seem to be no obligations on the United Kingdom under article 109j, bearing in mind that protocol.

Mr. Davies: Article 109j places an obligation on the Commission and the EMI, quite rightly, to make a report to the Council; but that report is about the fulfilment of the member states' obligation, which is to meet those four criteria.

Mr. Legg: We are facing a misunderstanding. Britain has not opted out of economic and monetary union: that is the central point. Our opt-out relates to stage 3; we have a commitment to economic and monetary union. We are in stage 2. Article 109j concerns the obligations of member states during stage 2, from which we have no opt-out because we are committed to economic and monetary union. As the right hon. Gentleman said earlier in his speech, this is a seamless garment.

Mr. Davies: I do not think much of this, but the convergence criteria outlined in article 3 on page 112 spell out the position with regard to the exchange rate mechanism. It states:

"the Member State shall not have devalued its currency's bilateral central rate against any other Member State's currency on its own initiative for the same period."

That is close to an obligation.

Article 109m on page 30 is the last article on the transitional arrangements. It states:

"Until the beginning of the third stage, each Member State shall treat its exchange rate policy as a matter of common interest."

That presupposes that member states have an exchange rate policy. One does not have to have one; one could let it float. Perhaps it is an exchange rate policy not to have an exchange rate policy. The article presupposes an exchange rate policy which, I should have thought, would be "a matter of common interest."

If there is a commonality of interest, we are all part of the ERM. Whether there is a specific legal obligation, whether it is all a bit vague or whether we can be taken to the court is academic. Once the treaty is ratified, and once we are into stage 2, the movement will be such that it will not be long before, I am sorry to say, we are back in the old ERM.

The Financial Secretary was very clear about it—clearer than other Ministers; or perhaps I have not listened to them all. He was clear about what would happen when the time was right or ripe: "There is no doubt that we have to get back to the heart of Europe, boys; we cannot be in the second division."

Mr. Cash: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber in the middle of the night when I revealed the document which had been leaked to me and which is entitled "Sterling in the ERM: Lessons from the September 1992 Crisis". It clearly contains advice given to Ministers. It concludes that sterling should re-enter the ERM when certain conditions have been met, and states:

"Sterling should re-enter with a narrow band."

That is the advice that is being given, and, what is more, it looks like the advice that is being taken, because we have heard the Financial Secretary pretty well endorse it.

Mr. Davies: I have no reason to doubt the authenticity of the hon. Gentleman's document.

Things have changed at the Treasury since I was there. We used to have tight control of public expenditure, we did not carry expenditure from year to year and we were against the ERM. We did not join, because we thought that it was nonsense. Now, it has all changed. I have no doubt that the Government will get the rate right this time, until it is proved to be wrong. There will be a crisis in Germany or something will happen in Thailand or the Balkans and the system will be blown off course because of fundamental problems and so on. We shall be back in the ERM because the trend is to be in it.

I am sorry for the Prime Minister. He did a good job in negotiating, but he should have had the courage of his convictions at the time and vetoed the wretched thing.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is always a great privilege and pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). I have had great respect for him since the 1970s. I opposed him when he was taking through the development land tax. It was a terrible tax, but I shall not go into that. He did his best and put up a good show. I think that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was also there. It was an unpleasant experience in some ways, but not because of the right hon. Member for Llanelli, who did the best that he could have done on that occasion.

I was especially impressed, as I believe the rest of the Committee was, by the way in which the right hon. Member for Llanelli developed his speech. It is enormously important that we consider the text of the treaty. I am sure that people come up to the right hon. Gentleman, as they do to me, and say, "Look, this is all a bit of a bore. It does not matter much. The French will change their Government, the Germans do not like it, and the British public do not like it either. It will not really happen." The right hon. Gentleman raised some important points, which I shall try to follow up later, but it was by going through the provisions line by line, interspersed with humour, as he has done for the past two hours, that he made it clear that we are dealing with what, if it is passed, will be the law of the land. It is therefore enormously important that we are given answers to some of the specific questions that he asked.

I am grateful that you have called me at this point, Dame Janet, not only because I have been waiting 16 hours to make my small contribution but because the group of amendments under consideration focuses upon the essence of the entire treaty. The movement towards monetary union, and towards the single currency which lies at the end of that movement, must be the essence of what we have been debating for the 16 or 17 previous sittings of the Committee.

At the root of our debates has been the question whether the treaty and the Bill represent a move towards a federal unitary state of Europe. That question has lain behind most of our debates and most hon. Members, in so far as they have been prepared to move outside the strictures of their whipping systems, have taken their stand according to their view on that basic question.

There are certainly some right hon. and hon. Members who believe in a federal state of Europe. They are few, but they put their case honestly and everybody has respect for them. Some other hon. Members have tended to shy away from confronting the issue. But many hon. Members have had to take a view on whether the treaty is a move towards a federal state of Europe. I take the view that I do precisely because of the aspect of the treaty which is now under consideration—the move towards a single currency.

There are two reasons for my view. First, the logic behind a single currency must be a federal state of Europe, not only because we are in the process of handing over control of our coinage and banking system, and of the cost of money and rates of interest, and are making the associated institutional changes, but because of what such a system would inevitably lead to. Some people say that it would inevitably mean higher unemployment throughout the union. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) made that point many hours ago—in what I believe is theoretically still the same parliamentary day. I happen to agree with my hon. Friend about that, but even if he is wrong, the system inevitably means that there will be pockets of severe deprivation which would not have existed without the single currency, if only because there will in effect be a single pricing mechanism, but there will not be a single wage structure.

Countries with low wages and high prices, paying Greek wages but German prices, will be extremely deprived. Unless the whole thing is to burst asunder and unless there are to be revolutions and revolts in Greece, there will have to be a compensatory central authority and a central taxation and expenditure authority. There will have to be everything that goes with a unitary federal state. That is one reason for believing that monetary union leading to a single currency will result in a federal state.

There is a second reason, which is the coincidence of that fact with the legal environment that is building up relentlessly—Lord Denning has called it "the tidal wave" of European law coming in. The combination of those two facts makes the treaty of Maastricht special and different from the amendments to the treaty of Rome that have come before it, and lethal if one is concerned about a move towards a unitary federal state of Europe, at least at this moment in our history.

9.30 am

Let me pursue the point about the law. First, I reiterate that, when people talk about the treaty not mattering, they are ignoring the fact that we are creating law and that some of that law is very specific. When people say, "The Germans will never allow a single currency to come about," they simply fly in the face of the appropriate articles, such as article 109j(4), which states:

"If by the end of 1997 the date for the beginning of the third stage has not been set, the third stage shall start on 1 January 1999."

That will be the law of the land; there is no messing about it. The first point to make about the law is that it will be there and will have to be complied with.

What brought the whole matter sharply into focus for me was the fact that we not only face the inevitability of a federal process arising out of the moves towards a single currency, but, in setting up that single currency, we shall move from a situation where the law may just be reversible by national Parliaments to a position where it is not. One moves, by terms of the treaty, into the world of the irrevocable. The word "irrevocable" is there in the treaty. Until then, there is at least legal debate to be had. It is true that some lawyers say that we have already passed the point of no return in terms of our sovereignty and point to the Merchant Shipping Act 1988. They say that they tried to set that law against a Commission-based law and lost —and, therefore, that we have passed the point of no return. I personally agree with the other lawyers who say that we have not yet reached the point—quite—where the British Parliament cannot unwind the legislation that has brought us to where we are at the moment.

Dr. Godman: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman. May I point out that it is a curious system of federalism where all the power goes to the centre? He cited the example of the Merchant Shipping Act, which was changed because of a decision by the European Court of Justice. Surely that decision taken by the judges in Luxembourg demonstrated in a plain, stark way the fact that that court has become a supreme court for all the legal systems of the 12 member states. We now have a situation, under article 177 of the treaty of Rome, whereby in England even magistates courts have referred decisions to the European Court of Justice for a ruling. There is a growing acceptance of the power of that supreme court.

Mr. Spicer: That is correct, and about 15 hours ago we debated that subject, when my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) made a telling speech in which he quoted cases to substantiate that point. Had I been able to intervene then, I would have referred to a number of other cases——

The Chairman: Order. We discussed those cases earlier. We do not want to discuss them again now.

Mr. Spicer: The only point that I would make in response to that intervention——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member does not have to respond, especially as I nearly called the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) to order for raising the issue of the court of justice.

Mr. Spicer: The combination of the law, which is becoming all pervasive, and the fact that, with the single currency, that law involves the use of the concept of the irrevocable makes certain the move towards federalism if the treaty is passed.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Article 3a deals with the irrevocable fixing of exchange rates. That is excluded by the protocol, but if we enter stage 3, which is anticipated, the trigger is set and we are caught by it.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend underlines the point. It is important to be clear about the meaning of "irrevocable." It means a coach and horses being driven through the fundamental principle guiding and governing the British House of Commons, that no one Parliament can bind another Parliament. We do not have a written constitution, but we have what we thought were inalienable conventions.

It seems impossible for us to maintain the sovereignty of Parliament in that sense if, from now on, a Parliament will bind irrevocably—which means for ever—all other Parliaments. We shall have abolished the sovereignty of our Parliament. The combination of the logic of what is being done on the road towards a single currency and the law arising out of the creation of that single currency is moving us inevitably towards a loss of sovereignty.

I do not understand the concept of pooling sovereignty. One either has or does not have sovereignty. Somebody must be at the top and through the Maastricht treaty, and in particular the aspect of the single currency, we move from the point at which we have sovereignty to a point at which we do not have it.

One can take a view about whether that is good or bad, but that is what will happen. That makes Maastricht different from other amendments to the treaty of Rome. People may say, "You voted for the Single European Act" and so on, but we are now moving into a fundamentally different area by establishing this irrevocable fixing of exchange rates, the single currency.

Mr. Bill Walker: The Committee has heard me many times draw attention to the objectives of the 1707 Act and compare the situation created by that measure with what is happening now. This Parliament was established as a result of that Act, which required the conditions to be for ever, which is much the same as irrevocable. I have been emphasising that from the beginning. A single currency and the remaining measures will make all the difference. We created this place and we know precisely what we have. We shall be creating that in Europe.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend makes a good point which he has made previously. It bears repeating because it is appropriate.

If the Government were participating in the debate, their answer would be that it may be what I have said it is, but it is irrelevant because we have the opt-out. With regard to the question of the opt-out, I shall refer to some points made by the right hon. Member for Llanelli. His concept of the seamless web is absolutely fundamental in this context. He raised many points in the context of the seamless web, but he raised a specific point which is valuable. I hope that the Government will examine carefully the text of the right hon. Gentleman's speech because it is valuable.

We have not had an answer to a specific question asked by the right hon. Gentleman—it is important that we get an answer because it is a specific point and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) underlined it. The right hon. Member for Llanelli raised the matter of the wording in article 109e(5):

> "During the second stage, each Member State shall, as appropriate, start the process leading to the independence of its central bank, in accordance with Article 108".

The Financial Secretary said that that does not mean what it looks like: it means that the legislation which is required to move towards an independent bank will be introduced only if the decision is made to move to a single currency. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary said that that would be the only sensible thing to do: there is no point in setting up an independent bank if we do not move towards the single currency for which it is appropriate.

That is a fair point and I agree with it. However, as the hon. Member for Dagenham said, that is not what the law will say. If the treaty is passed, the law will say what article 109e(5) says. I have scoured through the appropriate protocol, but I cannot see any reference to an opt-out on 109e(5). I can see references to opting out on 109e(4), but there is no reference to 109(e)5, which suggests that we have not in any way allowed for opting out of those words which will become the law of the land. The Government are under a great obligation specifically to answer the question: if we opt out of the single currency, will we not have to set up significant institutions immediately?

The right hon. Member for Llanelli played for a while with and was amusing when he talked about notes being passed backwards and forwards within the Treasury. This matter of the bank is crucial. It will change the whole process by which monetary policy has been conducted in the United Kingdom for hundreds of years. We are talking about something that is absolutely fundamental.

Dr. Godman: With regard to article 109e(5) becoming the law of the land, could that be achieved without the intervention of the court of justice making a decision? I am not going out of order, Mr. Morris, because I am referring to article 19, which spells out the relationship between the EMI and the court of justice. Article 19 says:

> "The acts or omissions of the EMI shall be open to review or interpretation by the Court of Justice".

Before article 109e(5) can become the law of the land, a ruling from the European Court of Justice will be required.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) is an expert, so I shall give way to him.

Mr. Legg: The specific article to which my hon. Friend refers will become part of the supreme law of the European union. If the United Kingdom does not comply with the supreme law of the European union, that matter can be taken to the European Court. My hon. Friend may also be aware that at present European central banks in France and Spain in particular are moving towards independence. It is not beyond the realms of fantasy to believe that some of our partners in Europe may take us to the European Court to make us start the process of taking our bank to independence because of the additional credibility that they would see that lending to EMU.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend has answered the point more elegantly that I would have done. I was going to make the same point that here we have the law and the question is whether we comply with it. If we did not comply with it, we would be subject to being taken to the court, which would then adjudicate whether we had applied the law. If we had not, it would insist that we did. To my mind—I am not a lawyer—the words are straightforward. If they can be interpreted differently, I shall be reassured.

I want to believe in the opt-outs. I find it difficult to believe in them.

9.45 am

Mr. Knapman: Whether or not we are lawyers—it turns out that we are not—would not it beggar belief that any nation would go through the pain of convergence and then not proceed to a single currency?

Mr. Spicer: That is the other point. The question about what credibility one attaches to the opt-out is partly, as we have discussed today or tonight, or wherever we are, one of running through the text and illustrating that the text shows how stage 2 legally moves smoothly into stage 3. That is a valuable thing to have established. The Government will have to show us what are the legal cut-off points and how we can contain the opt-out in a meaningful way. We need to hear much more about that because an interesting question has been opened up and we need hard answers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) has raised the psychology of the whole thing. If one has signed up to the establishment of various convergence conditions—clearly there is some argument to be had yet about how legally binding those converging conditions are—under stage 2, whether or not it is legally binding, one has an obligation. In the Treasury things will be moving in a direction which will lead to pain, as my hon. Friend says. One is involved directly or indirectly in the establishment of many institutions.

The EMI is a transitory institution. It has powers attached to it in stage 2 which we have had detailed for us. We then move to institutions which are not transitory but permanent. We have been involved in setting them up. Undoubtedly, officials will go backwards and forwards and get more and more involved and excited in their construction and their management.

I need to be persuaded that in a few years, having set up the institutions and been a party to many of them and legally bound into the processes that lead up to stage 3, we can cut ourselves from it. If the treaty is passed, I shall certainly be one of those who argue for the opt-out to be maintained because that will be the best that I shall be able to achieve at that time. But it worries me that I may be told then that the pass has been sold.

The Government will say, "Where were you in 1992-93 when all these things were being discussed?" As it happens I was here. One of the reasons why I am speaking tonight is that the Whips will not be able to come to me and say, "Spicer, you should have worked it out three or four years ago when all these things were being discussed. It was important then that you should have got your thoughts sorted out." I have tried to sort out my thoughts now because I want to anticipate that situation. I do not say that I will not argue like mad in two or three years' time, but at least they will not be able to say of me that I did not think it out at this stage.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend referred to officials and civil servants. Will we need more of them because it will be a complicated policy, or fewer of them because we shall no longer be running our own policy? Does my hon. Friend envisage any significant effect on the numbers of civil servants as a result of the passing of the treaty?

Mr. Spicer: The term "ratchet effect" has been used throughout the debate and that analogy is appropriate to any growth of administration. I suspect that we shall have more officials here and in Europe.

In conclusion, the amendments are absolutely central to what Britain and its constitution will become in the future. We may be setting up an inexorable process. The words "acquis communautaire" appear as one of the objectives of the treaty. It means a ratchet effect. When a process has been established, one can only move forward.

In my view, through the treaty, monetary union and the move towards a single currency we are making the jump towards a loss of sovereignty. We are crossing the Rubicon. The only issue is whether the opt-out that we have established is foolproof. Great doubts have arisen and many coherent points have been made. If the Government are to give any credibility to the concept of the opt-out, it is essential that they can demonstrate clearly how we can retain that opt-out and really believe in it.

Mr. Betts: The issues that we have been debating throughout the night—the central bank, economic policy and now the moves towards economic and monetary union—are at the heart of the treaty. I agree with hon. Members who spoke during the night and made the point forcefully about the hours that we are spending in debate, with many of us having been up throughout the night. It is not the proper way to give these issues the serious and necessary consideration that they merit.

Parliamentary sovereignty has been mentioned many times, but, given the fact that the House has not debated these matters in prime time, those words stick in the throat rather than trip off the tongue. I believe that the House has done neither itself nor the people we represent any service.

In the past, I have been given lectures by irate Liberal Democrats about the process of open government, access to information and the public being able to see what happens, yet they choose to debate these matters when the vast majority of the public we represent are in bed, as are most of the media who might report matters to them. In future, I will take no more lectures from Liberal Members. Although they are all absent, presumably they will at least do us the courtesy of reading Hansard. When Liberals refer to these issues in future, I shall simply ask them what they did on 24 March 1993 at 10 pm.

The Chairman: Order. I called the hon. Gentleman to speak on amendment No. 81, and not to give us a general lecture about parliamentary procedure, so I hope that he will now address the amendment.

Mr. Betts: Thank you, Mr. Morris.

Of the hon. Members who have spoken on these issues and throughout the debates on the treaty, a few have made it clear that they are in favour of Maastricht completely and absolutely and many have made it clear that they are against the treaty absolutely and completely. Some of us, however, do not fall neatly into those categories, and we must in the end decide how we vote on particular amendments, recognising that we have reservations about elements of the treaty. I share some of the reservations eloquently expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) when he introduced his amendments and in previous debates by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and others. I want to raise some of the very questions that have been raised. We have not always had adequate answers from the Government to those questions. In particular, the legal advice has been not just inadequate but almost non-existent.

I also recognise that there are parts of the treaty, particularly in the detailed areas that we are now discussing on economic and monetary union, which are open to interpretation. I do not know what the interpretation of the European Court of Justice may be or how the Council of Ministers will interpret these things when it debates some of its powers, so I must come to my own best judgment.

One of our problems in debating specific amendments is that we are debating a treaty which has been negotiated by the Government. It is a treaty which Parliament can discuss, debate and question; but we cannot select bits and pieces from the treaty and decide which we will vote for and which not. In the end, we must decide whether we are prepared to accept the treaty as it is, in total. That involves compromises—just as the original negotiation of the treaty must have involved compromises—for those of us who have to form a view on it now. While some of us may have instinctive sympathy with some of the amendments in isolation, we recognise that we must judge them in the light of their total effect on the treaty, and we must decide whether voting for them here would mean that the treaty could not be ratified and where that would leave the country's economy, its monetary policy and all the other issues that we are now dealing with.

One of my concerns about the whole process that we are going through, particularly as we consider these important matters of economic and monetary union, is that we are forced to debate them in this way. I should have been much happier if we could have debated these issues before the Government negotiated Maastricht. We could have had a public debate about the way we wanted to go and the Government would have been aware of that before they entered into this treaty, which we have now to decide on as a whole.

There is a problem with the wider powers now contained in this treaty which are going not just to the Commission but to the Council of Ministers. That is mentioned at various stages in the sections on economic and monetary union. One of my worries about the process is that when matters go to the Council of Ministers they immediately disappear from direct scrutiny and go behind closed doors—a process which is very different from debates in this Chamber. The reaction of some hon. Members is to say that we should not have powers of that kind going into European institutions. I would argue that it may not be wrong for powers on economic and monetary union to move into the European dimension. Perhaps powers should go from this Parliament, but I want the European Parliament to play a greater role in those processes.

It has been said that hon. Members who support federalism should say so. I shall not argue that case, but there is a debate about whether some of the powers that go to Europe through the treaty will rest with the right institutions, and about whether more powers should go to the European Parliament. That debate is still to come.

10 am

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is almost making a Second Reading speech. He must address the amendments that have been moved. He cannot give us a general Second Reading speech.

Mr. Betts: I was seeking to show that the Council of Ministers is relevant to some of the issues involved with economic and monetary union. We are debating amendments to clauses that contain references to powers going to the Council of Ministers, and I was seeking to draw that out, but I shall take your advice on the matter, Mr. Morris.

I readily accept many of my hon. Friends' criticisms of the economic and monetary policy contained in the treaty. The development of those processes and of the independent central bank are some of the key issues. I have major reservations about an independent bank and how it can operate within economic and monetary union, because that highlights some of the potential conflicts between the economic and monetary aspects of the treaty. It will cause difficulties and we must each form a view of the conflicts to determine how we shall vote on the treaty.

When considering how to approach the central bank, and how it fits into the workings of economic and monetary union, the potential alternatives—as opposed to those contained in the treaty—must be examined. If hon. Members do not like what is in the treaty, they must be prepared to argue for an alternative, which might be available.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the opt-out and I share the views of some hon. Members—who will probably decide that they cannot support the treaty—that the opt-out exists to give the Government an excuse to delay a decision until they can bring the House round to accepting stage 3 of economic and monetary union. I do not believe that it is realistic for this country to move to stage 2, which we are committed to through economic and monetary union, but not to move to stage 3. Once we accept stage 2, we cannot for ever remain the one member of the European Community which wants to remain free with a separate set of arrangements.

I therefore believe that, in ratifying the treaty, we are being asked to accept that, once we accept stage 2, stage 3 will ultimately follow. The Government will no doubt argue that there is an alternative to joining the independent central bank—stage 2, in which the Bank of England, would be separate and independent, in a nationalistic sense. To some extent, it would be independent of the rest of the European Community.

I do not believe that if every other country in the European Community is a member of the central bank, which will have the power of all the other Governments and economies behind it, one country can realistically stand aside and believe that it will be feasible for its central bank to operate independently while that country remained a member of the Community. The Government cannot ask any hon. Member to believe that that position is sustainable and they ought to deal with that problem in detail as they have not done so.

Could the Government ratify the treaty if the amendment moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli were carried by the Committee? Everybody has had to find legal advice. I may have been hallucinating from lack of sleep, but a few hours ago I had a vision of the Attorney-Geneal crossing by the Government Front Bench. Perhaps someone will confirm that I did see the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

It is important that Members should know the implications of their voting for an amendment. Amendment No. 27 deals with the social chapter opt-out. If that amendment is accepted, we shall be refusing to ratify a protocol that provides for an opt-out. The argument is that refusing to opt out does not amount to opting in and does not, therefore, amount to agreeing to anything. Acceptance of the amendments with which we are dealing now would be a very different matter. On the opt-out, that would keep us from moving automatically to the third stage of economic and monetary union, and would prevent us, I believe, from legally ratifying the treaty. Britain would not be removed permanently from the protocol. What we would have is an obstacle to a process that would otherwise be automatic. The treaty confirms the rest of the process, so the two situations are quite different.

The reference to stage 3 in the treaty amounts to acceptance of that stage for every other member country without the opt-out. If Britain were to refuse to accept stage 3, it could not ratify the treaty. In effect, we should not be accepting the process by which every other member state was to move towards stage 3. What the opt-out provision does for Britain, in terms of stage 3, is to put it in the same position as a member state that gets a derogation under the treaty. Such member states will effectively be in the same position as Britain, but they will have to ratify the treaty, including stage 3, even though they will not move to stage 3 themselves. We cannot have a situation in which some Community members are not at stage 3 but have had to agree to the process in order to ratify the treaty, whereas Britain stands alone.

I assume that, in the end, the Attorney-General will give us some advice on these points. The matter to which I have just referred is very important. As I have indicated, a vote for the amendment, which, if carried, would prevent the treaty from being ratified, would be a vote against the treaty as a whole. That is why it is so important that we should get appropriate legal advice.

Mr. Spearing: I understand my hon. Friend's personal dilemma. In giving expression to it, he has highlighted what I might call the structural relationships of these matters. The Attorney-General has not spent much time at this sitting of the Committee. Does my hon. Friend agree that before we vote on this amendment the very important matters that he has identified should be commented upon by the Attorney-General or by the Financial Secretary following consultation with the law officers of the Foreign Office or the Law Officers of the Crown?

Mr. Betts: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. We have a right to expect legal advice from the Attorney-General. On previous occasions, on the question of opt-outs, such advice has been forthcoming. It has been shown that legal advice given within Departments to Ministers can be questionable. I am not suggesting that it is deliberately questionable; I am simply making the point that it is important to have proper advice from the Attorney-General. This cannot be stressed too strongly.

Mr. Gould: I have been listening with interest and sympathy to the issues raised by my hon. Friend. He is clearly right to say that if the House were to vote for the amendment it would make it difficult, if not impossible, to ratify the treaty. But he has also made it clear that he disagrees with many of the treaty's provisions. Therefore, presumably he wants a treaty, but not necessarily every aspect of the Maastricht treaty. If that is his objective, there is only one way by which he can achieve it. There is no point in his voting for the treaty as he will not obtain any amendments. However, if he votes against the treaty by voting for an amendment such as the one under discussion and it is carried, and this country or any other were to refuse or be unable to ratify the treaty, it could not proceed. We should then be able to have exactly the sort of informed negotiations that my hon. Friend wants. We could conduct a new set of negotiations and, in the light of the very arguments that my hon. Friend has been advancing, produce a better treaty.

Mr. Betts: I accept some of my hon. Friend's criticisms of the treaty and agree with some of his analysis. I part company with him over his theory of what would happen if one of the amendments were carried and the Government could not ratify the treaty. My hon. Friend obviously believes that such an outcome would result in the treaty coming to a standstill while we had a separate round of negotiations to bring the treaty back into line with his views, and perhaps with mine on some issues. That begs two questions. First, if we had more of those negotiations, would they result in a more favourable treaty? Secondly, and more important, would those further negotiations take place or would the people of Britain—of whose credentials other people in Europe had always been suspicious—once again be regarded as not sufficiently pro-European, thus convincing the rest of Europe to carry on without Britain?

Mr. Gould: They cannot.

Mr. Betts: My hon. Friend says that Europe cannot carry on without us. I think that at some point the patience of other European countries may give and they may decide to construct a European Community that either has Britain attached to it in a different role, but not as a full member, or leaves Britain on one side as they carry on.

Mr. Gould: If we—or the Danes or the Germans—were the instrument by which it became impossible to ratify the treaty, I do not doubt that we would attract much odium from our European partners who would take great delight in blaming the perfidious Brits yet again. But I guarantee that, in private behind their hand, they would give an enormous sigh of relief that they had at last been let off the hook of a treaty that is manifestly unworkable and has failed to secure the support—let alone enthusiasm—of the people of Europe.

Mr. Betts: That is ultimately a matter of judgment. My hon. Friend has come to one conclusion. Having spoken to people in Europe—in the European Parliament and in our sister parties in Europe—I know that it is not the view that they express. The general view that I have received is that if Britain were not to ratify the treaty, there would be much concern among people in Europe. But they may well not express that concern by saying, "Oh dear, how can we change the treaty to accommodate all the wishes of Britain?" They might just say, "Once again, Britain has proved not to be as pro-European as we would like—perhaps it is time that we moved on without them."

Mr. Cash: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that the Danes have turned down the treaty in a referendum and the French only passed it by an absolute whisker—only 36 per cent. of the French electorate were in favour. We all know that the Germans are in a state of turmoil over the treaty. The people of Europe—whom the hon. Gentleman is alleging are in favour of the treaty—have gone off it. The leaders continue to believe that the grand design will work. Perhaps they do so for reasons of stubbornness, pride or because they have a grand idea that they are reincarnations of Henry of Navarre. The treaty will not work, because people do not want it. Some 73 per cent. of the British people say that they want a referendum, and I think that they should get it.

Mr. Betts: In the three countries that the hon. Gentleman mentions the situation is different. The German issue was described earlier in the debate as a technicality and no one seriously suggests that the German Government will not ratify the treaty. The Danes are to hold another referendum. From what I have heard and read, the way in which the Danish issue has been finessed leaves little to the imagination. Some of the key issues that we are concerned about are not necessarily the issues that have been addressed in Denmark.

The French have had a referendum and if the French people had not accepted the treaty we would be in a different situation. However, they did, and Britain is seen to be dragging its feet and has been viewed in the past as not being as committed to Europe as other countries are. Many of those who oppose ratification do not think that we should be in the European Community at all. By no means do I direct that comment at all those who oppose ratification.

10.15 am

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the French referendum was a reflection of what happened last week in the French elections rather than a real view of Europe? The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the people of Europe are absolutely in favour of Maastricht. Votes are often a reflection of the political climate in a country rather than a view about Europe.

Mr. Betts: I am not sure that we could draw all the lessons from the French elections that people would like to draw. One of the lessons that can be drawn from them is that if the Maastricht process collapses and the good will is lost it may not be possible to return to square one in the negotiations and reconstruct a treaty within a reasonably short time. That point is made forcefully by people representing a wide range of political opinion in Europe.

There are growing forces for nationalism in Europe and they may be given succour if the treaty collapses. We saw the vote last week for Le Pen and his party and we have witnessed the growth of the Republican party in Germany. People are concerned about those things. I do not say that Maastricht is the last bastion against fascism because I do not want to go overboard, but those forces are around and no one quite knows what would happen if the Maastricht process collapses. We must sound a cautionary note about that.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Will my hon. Friend at least acknowledge that the process may work in precisely the opposite way? There may be a gap between European parliamentary processes and the people, and that may lead to a huge sense of disbelief about the economic and political momentum into which Europe seems to be locked. My hon. Friend spoke about his dilemma in deciding whether to vote for a treaty containing huge elements with which he profoundly disagrees. Perhaps I can give my hon. Friend an analogy. Anyone who wants to join the boy scouts does not begin by locking himself into the Moonies, because it is better not to be in an institution at all than to be in one that we cannot leave. It may be healthier for my hon. Friend to make a stand and set out precisely the positive ground of the Europe that he wants to be in, rather than to be locked into a Europe that he does not want.

Mr. Betts: If we are to remove the forces of nationalism and racism in Europe, we must take the European debate to an agenda that will address the real problems of unemployment and recession. It is a matter of judgment whether acceptance of the treaty and working forward from there gives a better opportunity than either allowing the treaty to collapse or seeing Britain removed from the process while other countries continue with it.

Having studied the matter for several months, I concluded that accepting the treaty, imperfect though it is, and building on its elements will give us the best opportunity to address problems—rather than risk the whole process collapsing or Britain remaining outside European development. We run that risk if, by our voting for certain amendments, the treaty is not ratified.

It is said that Britain would be in the slow lane or second division, and that opting out of stage 3 is part of that process. If we did not ratify the treaty—to continue the motoring analogy—we would be on a B road going in a completely different direction.

I choose to approve the treaty and to vote down the amendments because I share the concerns of my hon. Friends about unemployment, growth and investment—though I arrive at a different conclusion about how they should be approached. I acknowledge that most hon. Members who raise those issues do so not in a narrow, nationalistic sense or argue that power must remain within the House. Nevertheless, some hon. Members contend that the House should retain all powers and that votes in Parliament will solve our problems, irrespective of our membership of the Community. To retain power may be politically desirable to them, but if Britain were to be independent of the Community, it could only achieve certain things in the European and international economic climate that it would confront. In this day and age, it is impossible for a country such as Britain to grapple with the massive issues and the forces of international capital. We must recognise how much we depend, as a small nation, on trade and the difficulties we would face using a separate currency. We must recognise the enormous shifts of capital and the forces of speculation.

We must question whether votes in a Parliament of a United Kingdom excluded from the Community and its processes would achieve the objectives of full employment, growth and investment that many Members who have different views on how to vote want to achieve.

Many aspects of the treaty are potentially or actually contradictory. As one reads through it, one can detect a shift in its monetary and economic approach from growth and employment to price stability being the all-important issue. I readily accept that aspects of the treaty have all the hallmarks and elements of the monetarist age of the 1980s. They were written for different times and from a different perspective, to meet a different set of problems.

I reject the notion that if price stability is achieved, everything else will fall into place and full employment will automatically occur—or that full employment would not matter very much. If we are to address the problems of the 1990s, we must turn this debate around and tackle the real problems of the economy, investment and growth. Price stability—by which is meant low inflation, because no one can argue for nil inflation—is only likely to be achieved if the real economy is put right.

People talk about the Bundesbank, how it operates and how it might be a model. It should not be argued, however, that, because it is independent, the Bundesbank has created price stability, thus making the German economy successful; more to the point, the German economy has been successful because of the investment that went into it immediately after the war. That continual increase in growth has allowed workers to enjoy regular improvements in living standards and firms to increase their profits. The pressure for price inflation has not been there.

In fact, the Bundesbank's job has been relatively easy. It has worked in harmonious conditions: until the recent problems of unification with East Germany, it could do no wrong. It strikes me as a little simplistic to use the analogy of the Bundesbank in establishing how we should develop the future of Europe.

I recognise the difficulties in the treaty. The economic and monetary sections could almost have been written by different people. The Government bear some responsibility for those problems; I do not think that it is up to Opposition Members to defend the wording of the treaty. Naturally, the Government will defend it because it is their treaty, but we shall put them on the spot in pointing out its many inadequacies.

I believe that failing to ratify the treaty would be wrong: I believe that we must remain at the heart of Europe—a phrase which has been used many times in the debate. We must, however, look at what is in the treaty —as suggested earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith)—and see how we can build positively on its contents in helping to set the agenda for growth, investment and employment in Europe in the 1990s. We must recognise that there are openings for interpretation in the economic and monetary aspects. We must argue as strongly as we can for the right interpretation to set the agenda for the future.

We have heard many references throughout the debate to the clauses in the Bill, and the sections of the treaty, that should have primacy. I strongly believe that we should take article 2 as the basis—not just because it appears at the beginning, although that is probably a fairly good point at which to start. Some time ago, I had an argument with my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) about whether the treaty should be read backwards or forwards; for my present purpose, I shall read it forwards.

Article 2 has been mentioned many times. It refers to "harmonious and balanced development of economic activities, sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment, a high degree of convergence of economic performance, a high level of employment and of social protection, the raising of the standard of living and quality of life, and economic and social cohesion".

That is the basis on which the rest of the treaty hangs, and it is linked with many other aspects of the economic and monetary criteria that are laid down.

Article 3 refers to the timetable set for economic and monetary policy. All the matters concerned are for the purposes set out in article 2. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney tried to suggest earlier that, ultimately, the whole policy was guided by the principles of stable prices and sound public finances; but article 3 states that, notwithstanding that guidance, the activities referred to are

When reading the economic and monetary sections of the treaty, we must keep returning to the points in article 2, and stressing those points.

I accept that, to some extent, that is a subjective reading of the treaty, but I believe that everyone who reads it has a subjective view. Because, in my view, the treaty will ultimately be ratified, it is important for us to bear those points in mind and use them as a basis for future discussion.

Mr. Gould: Those who drafted the treaty thought of my hon. Friend's point about its interpretation. They make specific reference to it in article 105, which establishes the primary objective of the European central bank:

"The primary objective of the ESCB shall be to maintain price stability."

It goes on to say:

"Without prejudice to the objective of price stability, the ESCB shall support the general economic policies . . . laid down in Article 2."

In other words, article 105 takes on board the very argument with which my hon. Friend is dealing and says that, "without prejudice" to the more general provisions in article 2, the overriding objective of price stability shall nevertheless take effect.

10.30 am

Mr. Betts: I do not demur from my hon. Friend's point, which shows the potential for conflict in the treaty and why I do not seek to defend every aspect of it. It contains contradictions, and one can interpret things in different ways. As I said earlier, one problem is that some of the economic criteria in the treaty appear to have been written in different languages and emphasise different points from the monetary criteria.

I am concerned about the independent central bank, not only because of the independence but because of article 105, which my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) just read, and which is the guidance given to the bank about the objectives that it will pursue. Price stability is given primacy, but there is a different emphasis in the general objectives of the treaty where it is issues such as employment and growth which are given primacy.

[Mr. Betts]

I was going to mention later the general principles in the protocol for the EMI in article 3 on page 104, but I shall do so now. Article 3 states, as does article 105:

"The EMI shall act in accordance with the objectives and principles stated in Article 2" which links back to article 2 of the main treaty through article 3a, which is for the purpose of achieving article 2. There is so much interaction in the treaty that it shows all the hallmarks of being written by a committee, or even two committees. One of the problems is that the treaty is open to different interpretations, depending on which article one selects and which aspect one emphasises to make a particular point.

Mr. Spearing: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, which is substantially and philosophically similar to that made by our Front-Bench spokesman. The broad principles and aspirations and the humanitarian approach of the general principles of the early articles should be built on, but our argument, so ably put a little while ago in the analysis made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli, shows that the operational small print on which actions and policies are determined, reports made and disciplines ensured makes those aspirations generally difficult, if not impossible. That is why the treaty must not be ratified.

Mr. Betts: I do not necessarily agree with my hon. Friend's conclusion, as there is a different emphasis in different parts of the treaty. I would still argue that article 2 sets out the general purposes for the rest of the treaty. I would also say——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman had a helpful intervention from the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). We are dealing with amendments that cover operational points. The hon. Gentleman has hardly alluded to them, but keeps returning to article 2 and making generalised comments. He must deal specifically with the amendments.

Mr. Betts: I was trying to say that the operational points are linked to the general issues. Indeed, article 102a begins to spell out the operational points but is clearly linked to article 2. Article 102a states:

"Member States shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community as defined in Article 2".

However, I would be the first to accept that the wording of the operational aspects can be difficult and that we shall have to deal with the issue of interpretation.

The operation of the budget deficit criteria—the avoidance of a deficit—is very much part of the move towards economic and monetary union. It is one of the key aspects of convergence, which has received a great deal of attention.

Our debates so far have shown that, although the conditions might at first be thought to be a clear and rigid set of criteria, meaning that a country has at all times to set its governmental deficit at no more than 3 per cent. of GDP, and its overall governmental debt at no more than 60 per cent. of GDP, when we start to analyse the exact wording that surrounds and conditions the criteria, we get a different point of view.

The rigid criteria refer only to the initial report that has to be produced. As has already been said, when action is to be taken on the report, account has to be taken both of the extent to which the deficit is incurred because of a need for investment and of the medium-term and budgetary policies of the Government concerned. I accept that, as was said earlier, it would have been more helpful if the nature of counter-cyclical measures had been clearly spelt out in the treaty. That has not happened, but the fact that the word "counter-cyclical" does not appear does not necessarily mean that the reference to medium-term strategies cannot allow for the need for a counter-cyclical strategy when judging whether a budget deficit is excessive as part of the process of moving towards economic and monetary union.

That is a clear example of the possibility of drawing out from the treaty views different from those that it might initially have been thought to contain. It follows that there will be a need to ensure that within Community discussions and debates such issues are interpreted in one way rather than another. Indeed, one could argue that one of the issues highlighted is the need clearly to separate out the reasons why Governments borrow money.

No one could be in favour of excessive deficits. The very nature of the word "excessive" implies that the deficit is wrong. However, I strongly argue that we should focus on the need for long-term investment. If necessary, and within the criteria, we should be able to increase Government deficits in order to borrow for long-term infrastructure investment, which would be an integral part of trying to set the agenda for the growth and development in Europe that we have already discussed. Such matters can therefore be interpreted differently from the way in which they have previously been interpreted.

I can see problems that need attention, and I shall now deal with the transitional provisions. Article 109e, for example, takes us back to an emphasis on financial policy:

"the Council shall, on the basis of a report from the Commission, assess the progress made with regard to economic and monetary convergence, in particular with regard to price stability and sound public finances".

I readily accept that in the operational conditions governing the transitional provisions the emphasis has been shifted back to price stability and sound public finances. However, again the wording is potentially open to interpretation. The exact words are:

"assess the progress made with regard to economic and monetary convergence, in particular with regard to price stability and sound public finances."

That is not a rigid provision. If we are in the process of accepting the treaty and then seeing where we go from there, that article allows room for interpretation, to bring in issues other than price stability and sound public finances.

I accept that for convergence it is vital to get back on the agenda the issues of growth, investment and employment which are contained in article 2, but which do not appear specifically in article 109e. For example, article 130a, which deals with regional policy, contains a specific requirement to consider ways of removing divergences in regional policy—different growth rates, employment levels and standards of living—in different parts of the Community. The treaty must be read as a whole. I would argue that, although article 109e specifically refers to price stability and sound public finances, it does not actually exclude other criteria, which could be brought into play in a reappraisal of the convergence criteria. We should like those real economic issues to be addressed. That is why it is important that hon. Members who are highly critical of the treaty should recognise that there may be other interpretations, which may even be more helpful to them in their pursuit of their objectives.

Much emphasis has been placed on article 109j, which refers to the fulfilment of conditions for eventually moving through to stage 3 of economic and monetary union. That provision is highly financial in content, referring to price stability, the Government's financial position and the exchange rate; the ERM is also mentioned. I should have been much happier with the treaty if those parts of it had also dealt with the real convergence criteria. I do not justify or defend every aspect of the treaty or claim that it is perfect. I agree that certain parts of it are deficient. In their present form, the conditions of convergence in article 109j are not the conditions that I would have chosen to include.

Ultimately, however, we have to decide whether we should abandon the whole process because of that or accept that those criteria, such as they are, are nevertheless part of a wider treaty and that, in the interpretation of those criteria set in that wider context, there will be pressures on Governments in the Community that are different from the pressures that existed—and the issues that were paramount—when the treaty was drafted. The interpretation of those criteria will be a matter of political judgment when the time comes.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if the treaty is to be ratified at all, it has to be ratified by 12 member states unanimously? In the light of the hon. Gentleman's thoughtful speech, let me ask him this: if there is something inherently wrong with the treaty—and he is suggesting that there is—how are we to get the 12 member states which have unanimously agreed to the treaty to agree unanimously to unravel it, especially when five or six of them have their noses deep in the subsidy trough, which is the reason why they went into the thing in the first place? If we are locked into the treaty with no right of secession, and with unanimity being required to unravel it, the whole of the hon. Gentleman's argument collapses.

Mr. Betts: The hon. Gentleman speaks of noses in the subsidy trough. I believe that the structural funds, which transfer resources to poorer members of the Community —particularly countries such as Spain—are extremely important in terms of Community funds. I do not regard the process as involving noses in the trough. I happen to consider the funds an important part of the real criteria for convergence, rather than the simple monetary criteria laid down in the treaty. Far from rubbishing and deriding that process, I should like to see the structural funds enhanced.

I do not necessarily accept all the wording in the treaty and have reservations and concerns about it, but I emphasise that certain things can be done within the European Community structure, and one of them is to increase the structural funds and try to consider points of real economic convergence that are already permissible within the treaties that we have signed under European legislation, and how we might achieve them. Political will is needed to push ahead with that if it is to be achieved.

Those who oppose the treaty's ratification hold diverse views. Some argue that ratification would lead us back to a different set of negotiations. Others would like to abandon the whole thing and not have any fresh negotiations. Some are philosophically opposed to the creation of a single currency, and I understand their view. In my view, the essential aims of the treaty—the move towards a single currency—should be supported. We should act to remove the power of the speculators in the money markets. I cannot think of any other way to do that.

I accept that there are alternatives, and it is incumbent on hon. Members who do not want to go down the Maastricht road to spell out the alternatives. We could allow the currency to float and let the speculators determine the levels, but that would not be a sensible long-term way to run an economic policy. Speculators should not determine on a day-to-day, week-to-week, month-to-month basis the value of our currency.

10.45 am

Mr. Gould: The evidence of recent events, before 16 September and currently in the case of other currencies, shows that enormous power is given to the speculators by establishing a gap between what one says one's currency is worth and what it is worth in the marketplace. Creating that stance makes it possible for the speculators to have a field day.

It is nonsense for my hon. Friend, with whose speech I substantially agree in most other respects, to say that somehow, by fixing our currencies or by eliminating the foreign exchange markets, we would remove our economies from the speculative effects of currency speculation or insulate ourselves against the factors that are reflected when there is turmoil on the foreign exchange markets.

Mr. Betts: By moving to a single currency in Europe, we would remove the speculation. Other than that, I am considering the alternatives. Free floating is one, although I do not accept it. A rigid currency, with one country trying to hold its currency at a certain value independently, is not a realistic stance. If interest rates were a problem in the ERM, they would be an enormous problem and be completely out of the control of Governments if one Government tried to fix their currency rigidly and independently. Or one could move to a managed system such as the ERM, which is a staging post in the treaty towards a single currency.

The problems that we had in the ERM were twofold. We went in at far too high a rate. The Government got that badly wrong. The ERM was not designed as a permanent set of fixed rates between different currencies. It was established as a managed system under which there could be adjustments periodically to reflect different pressures. That was not allowed to happen, so enormous cracks appeared as pressures built up.

I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham that the problem of speculation throws up differences within different economies. The problems caused by those differences must be resolved. I accept that devaluation has been a way of resolving those issues in the past. Before the election, I argued for a realignment within the exchange rate mechanism precisely because of those pressures.

In the long term, I would argue that devaluation of the currency is not the sort of policy objective which we want to follow. We should be getting back to the issue of why devaluations have been necessary. It is because of real factors in the economy which diverge between countries. If we are realistic about wanting the agenda of full employment and growth, the move towards a single currency where devaluation is not an objective or mechanism should make us start to address the issues about why economies are diverging and get joint action on a European basis to achieve the objective of full employment and growth which we want to see. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham does not agree with that point. My argument is that the only alternative is to have free-floating exchange rates, and let them follow the real factors.

Mr. Gould: It is not that I disagree with my hon. Friend. Of course, he is absolutely right that there are real performance indicators which matter in determining the true course of our economy. I disagree with his assumption that decisions on matters such as exchange rates, interest rates and monetary policy have no impact on the real performance matters. If we get those matters endemically wrong, as we have done over a long period, and then propose to entrench those mistakes in precisely the way proposed by the treaty, any hope that we have of securing a real economic convergence will be totally undermined.

Mr. Betts: The one issue about which I have real concern is the independence of the central bank. My hon. Friend knows my views about that matter. I cannot be eclectic about it because, although I believe that it will be possible politically to interpret some of the criteria in the treaty in a way which would be favourable to my arguments, I agree that the independence of the central bank is a major worry in that regard. Eventually, it will be found to be wanting and we shall have to readdress it in a fundamental way.

Mr. Simpson: In asking for a coherent alternative, does my hon. Friend accept that the whole package of proposals which such a coherent alternative would have to encompass would not address a single variable in the economy? It would make no sense simply to focus on the exchange rate mechanism as the only lever of an economy on which to reconstruct and achieve growth towards full employment.

If we take the package as a whole in terms of moving interest rates by wielding Government decisions about borrowing powers and Government debt, and if we subscribe to the terms of convergence, we shall fall into a trap. Those are precisely the constraints——

The Chairman: Order. As I have said several times during the night, interventions should be succinct and to the point. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is probably long enough.

Mr. Knapman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your guidance on Standing Order No. 35 which says:

"After a question has been proposed a Member rising in his place may claim to move, 'That the question be now put,' and, unless it shall appear to the chair that such motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the question 'That the question be now put,' shall be put forthwith."

I draw that to your attention because in the past couple of hours—although we have heard only three speakers—some weighty legal points have been raised by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and some equally valid ones have been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer)——

The Chairman: Order. Those are hypothetical points to me. I call Mr. Betts.

Mr. Knapman: Am I not entitled to finish my point of order?

The Chairman: Order. I have ruled on that point of order which the hon. Gentleman raised, and I have called Mr. Betts.

Mr. Cash: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. Under Standing Order No. 35 and the reference to the rights of the minority, if only three speakers have spoken in the debate, and there was any question of anyone——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is right that so far three people have spoken, but that has been true of many debates. At no point have I accepted a closure motion after only three people have spoken.

Mr. Knapman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: No, I will not take any further points of order. I call Mr. Betts.

Mr. Betts: I am doing my best to remember the point that my hon. Friend——

The Chairman: I call Mr. Betts on the amendments.

Mr. Betts: I was trying to remember the point that was made in the intervention, Mr. Morris. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) said that exchange rate mechanisms were not the sole weapon in the armoury.

Mr. Simpson: May I refresh my hon. Friend's memory? I simply asked him——

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. Gentleman cannot remember the intervention, it is hard luck.

Mr. Betts: As I remember it, my hon. Friend said that exchange rate mechanisms were one weapon, but they should not be the only weapon to seek convergence between countries and rectify discrepancies between them. We must accept that if we move to a common currency, we shall remove the exchange rate as a mechanism for adjusting the economic performance of various countries. We shall lose one of the weapons in our armoury. That is one of the prices that we pay for that process. I would argue that it is a price worth paying for removing speculation.

Many people have said that they are either in favour of the treaty or against it, and that is the end of the story. I am not wholeheartedly in favour of the Maastricht treaty, although I believe that the general objectives set out in article 2 take us in the right direction. We can achieve that only if we remain a full member of the European Community. That is the only way in which we can achieve the objectives of investment growth and full employment.

If we accepted amendments that meant that the Government could not ratify the treaty, we would end up outside the European Community or, at best, we would become a second-class member of the Community. The treaty is far from perfect. I have tried to show that there are conflicts within it. There are differences of emphasis in different parts of the treaty. They range from the clear acceptance in article 2 that the principles of employment are paramount, to article 105 in which, as my hon. Friends have rightly said, price stability clearly comes to the fore.

I recognise that that creates a degree of ambiguity. I have said that it is not for Opposition Members to justify or explain that. That is up to the Government. However, whatever the difficulties with the treaty, we must work to develop an agenda within the EC which gives primacy to the employment growth and investment criteria in article 2, whatever the constraints in later parts of the treaty. We should seek to resolve any potential conflicts in the treaty in favour of achieving employment growth and investment. That is why Opposition Members who are prepared to accept the treaty, imperfect as it is, have set ourselves a course that recognises some of the flaws, but also recognises that it is probably the best that we can achieve to set the agenda for growth in the 1990s which is so urgently needed.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I beg to move, That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I understood that there was a tradition in the House that Members vote and speak in the same way. I understand that at 10 o'clock last night Liberal Democrat Members voted for us to continue our proceedings all night. They seem to have disappeared now. I should have thought that it was perfectly reasonable that if they had voted——

The Chairman: Order. The appearance or disappearance of hon. Members is certainly not a matter for the Chair. I call Mr. Bennett on a point of order.

Mr. Bennett: It is not a point of order.

The Chairman: I shall take a point of order from the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and then I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cash: The Liberals have gone, but there is an important amendment that they tabled which would have left out the United Kingdom protocol. It is extraordinary and outrageous that an amendment should be tabled in the name of the leader of the Liberal Democrat party and they are not even here——

11 am

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is wearing a very bright tie this morning, but that still does not mean he can abuse the Chair by raising points of order that are totally bogus.

Mr. Bennett rose——

The Chairman: I call the hon. Gentleman on a second point of order.

Mr. Bennett: It is not a point of order.

The Chairman: Let me clarify matters for the Committee. We are now on a debate on the motion that I report progress and ask leave to sit again. The scope of that debate, to which I am prepared to listen, is that it should be confined to whether the debate should continue. It has nothing to do with who was here in the middle of the night and who was not, or which party was here or who tabled which amendment. Before I call the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) to speak, are there any more points of order?

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Fortunately, you have already answered one aspect of my point of order. Those of us who have sat through the night have admired the way in which you have handled things, and I mean that most sincerely. Will you tell the House whether the conduct of Members who move motions and then do not remain for them is borne in mind when the Chair is considering whether they should be called in future debates?

The Chairman: The Chair has many things to bear in mind in deciding who should speak. Mr. Bennett has the floor.

Mr. Bennett: I shall begin by drawing attention to the fact that last night hon. Members decided that it was a good idea for us to work from 10 o'clock at night right through until a few moments ago.

People outside the House will ask whether we are making the most logical use of our time. It seems odd that the Government should now seek to report progress rather than to continue. Most of my constituents would have found it much more logical for us to debate this issue between 10 o'clock in the morning and 5 o'clock at night rather than between 10 o'clock at night and 10 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Cryer: Does my hon. Friend accept that reporting progress is a determination of whether these important issues that affect the entire nation should continue to be debated in the Chamber? Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government are moving progress not because they are concerned with the nation at large but because they have done a dirty deal with the Liberals and are trying to stick to it?

Mr. Bennett: I am sure that if we started talking about all the deals that have been done in the Corridors of this place, we would have a lot to debate and I also suspect that you would not be very happy about that, Mr. Morris.

I want to address the central question whether we are making sensible use of our time. I should have thought that it would have been perfectly reasonable for the Government to tell us their plans for the rest of the day. Will we have the farce that we now adjourn and do not return to this business until possibly 9 o'clock this evening; we then continue through the evening and at 10 o'clock some arrangement is made with the Liberals by which we either continue to debate crucial issues in the small hours of the morning or will we use a more sensible procedure that, having continued until 11 o'clock in the morning, we carry on?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asked some extremely important questions and I should like to hear some answers. It is extremely difficult to have a debate which is then interrupted and then to have to wait until possibly this evening, the small hours of the morning or Monday before we get the answers to the very important questions that my right hon. Friend posed. It is disgraceful that the Government cannot tell us specifically what they intend to do.

Dr. Godman: Is my hon. Friend aware that a number of us have been here for several hours and were hoping to speak in a continuing debate on the amendments? [Interruption.] One of my hon. Friends says that I look as though I have been here all night. It is more than a matter of asking questions; it is a keenness to take part in the debate. So the debate should continue.

Mr. Bennett: I accept that point. My central concern is that very important questions were raised on this group of amendments about the future financial position of the country and they are questions that the House should address. It is ridiculous that, instead of addressing them at an important time of day, when people can rise to logical debate, the Government want to shuffle the debate off so that once again we end up with a debate late at night when hon. Members are less likely to be able to follow the arguments that have been put forward.

I appeal to the Government to tell us now what they intend to do. Do they intend to report progress now and ask leave to sit again tomorrow, which is, of course, today —one of the farces of parliamentary procedure—so that we will reach the wind-up to the debate some time late in the evening? Or is it their intention not to move the 10 o'clock motion tonight, so that we end up with a response to the debate, which was started at half-past seven this morning by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), at some point on Monday? One of my hon. Friends says "Tuesday". That is one of the difficulties of trying to remember which day it is, particularly when we are in the farcical position where people outside think that today is Thursday but inside the House it is Wednesday.

Mr. Cryer: Would my hon. Friend also bear in mind the fact that there is really no point in having a break now because we will not have, in a debate on Thursday—which it is outside, but it is still Wednesday in here—time to have Hansard printed so that we can read the speeches of the various Members who have spoken through the night? Would not the best way to proceed be to get the Government to join in this debate by saying that they will abandon the Bill completely and allow Hansard to be printed?

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The hon. Member is not addressing the Chair.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: The sedentary point of order was correct: the hon. Gentleman should address the Chair, although I accept that he was getting a little carried away. I should be grateful if in future he would address the Chair.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Naturally I will accept your guidance, but I was bringing matters of importance to the attention of the Committee. I should be grateful if you would tell some of the Tories, particularly the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), not to shout from a sedentary position—something which, I am sorry to say, she does frequently.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: I was merely responding to the lamentable behaviour of the hon. Members opposite.

The Chairman: The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish had the floor.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Bennett: I have to start my speech before I can give way, but I will give way now.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I just want to raise one matter with the hon. Member. He has been sitting here all night, waiting to get into this debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "No, he has not."] We have had something of the order of 24 blocks of major amendments since we started the Maastricht debates; only three of them have been on economic affairs and all three have been discussed during the night. The debate on them has missed the newspapers. It has missed the ventilation that it should have had. It is important that those outside should know the exact position. Does the hon. Member agree?

Mr. Bennett: I very much agree. That is why I wanted to find out the Government's intentions for the rest of the day and that is what we are debating—whether we should report progress. Many people would like us to do so, but we do not want to if key economic answers are going to be given in the middle of the night. I certainly would have liked to have heard the Government's intentions for tomorrow—which is today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) said that we could not read the speeches made during the debate. He said that we cannot read the most useful speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) because it is not in Hansard. I do not think that my hon. Friend is correct because I understand that the typescript of the spill-over session goes to the Library, once Hansard has completed it, so I think that my hon. Friend could read it there. If he did not hear that speech, I recommend it to him as it is worth while reading.

Some people outside the House feel that our speeches on Maastricht are simply filibusters, but I stress to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South that, although the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli was long, every word was extremely important. Anyone outside this place who is under the misunderstanding that we are filibustering should take the trouble to read that speech. He would then be aware that my right hon. Friend raised important issues concerning the future economy of this country.

Mr. Cryer: Does my hon. Friend accept that, although he might be right technically that a version of Hansard is available in the Library shortly after the debate has finished, in reality every hon. Member has the right to receive Hansard and to read it.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Order.

Mr. Cryer: The fact that one copy might be available in the Library is no substitute for the right of 651 Members to receive Hansard.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Order.

Mr. Cryer: I should be grateful if my hon. Friend could comment on that, although I realise that there are grave difficulties because of the continuing interruptions of the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), who seems to be behaving very badly so early in the morning.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Would you please assure the rather obstreperous Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) that I am drawing perfectly proper points of order to the notice of the Chair? That includes the point of order that hon. Members are coming into the Chamber and walking upright in front of those Members who are speaking, thus breaking their eye line with the Chair.

The Chairman: The hon. Lady is quite right and I take this opportunity to point out to all hon. Members that the incidence of hon. Members interfering in the sightline between the Chair and the hon. Member who is speaking has increased and that that practice should cease. That has occurred on both sides of the Chamber, although it has happened only on one side this morning. Also, may I say that the hon. Lady looks to me to be in the peak of fitness this morning.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Could you confirm that the manner of interjection by the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) was not to raise a point of order. She did not say, "On a point of order." She yelled "Order" from a sedentary position, as if the Chairman of this Committee had turned into some kind of street yodeller on the other side of the Chamber.

The Chairman: Order. That is a bogus point of order.

Mr. Bennett: Before all those interruptions, I was trying to explain what I believe to be the central matter for the Committee. We should debate the Bill in an orderly fashion and the Government should set out what is happening clearly.

I heard the important speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli, but I have not heard speeches from Liberal Members because their amendments were apparently not included in this group. We have also not had the opportunity to hear from my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench or from the Minister.

I want to know whether the Government intend to report progress and ask leave to sit again this afternoon. We understand that there is to be a statement on coal this afternoon, as well as business questions, so the key answers to our economic debate will take place between 6 and 7 o'clock this evening and may go on past 10 o'clock. The key answers to future questions of unemployment which affect my constituency and elsewhere in the country could be debated in the small hours of the morning again. I am sure that the public will not understand that.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. He might want to consider the fact that we have not had from the Government any indication as to when they will close the debate on the vital issue of the economic character of Europe.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hain: Until we do, we shall not know——

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hain: —whether the issues are being——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is getting into the habit of continuing his speech after I have called him to order. Let me make it quite clear to him that I decide when there should be a closure.

11.15 am

Mr. Bennett: It is very worrying that the Government have not told us what their plans are. I shall happily give way to the Minister if he is prepared to tell us what we are to do for the rest of the day. It is important that the hon. Members who move amendments be present to hear the remainder of the debate. Failure by the Government to give us some indication of their intentions will amount to extreme discourtesy to the Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has made a point about the availability of Hansard. It is farcical that we should have to wait 24 hours for the Official Report, as an electronic system of printing is being used. Hansard should be available to hon. Members electronically within an hour or two. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) is complaining from a sedentary position. No doubt he was not here at half-past seven this morning.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): As you, Mr. Morris, have said, the decision about a vote is a matter for you. Actually, I believe that it is about time we had one. People in the Galleries and people outside deserve better. Maastricht has not been mentioned in the last 45 minutes.

Mr. Bennett: I shall not question the hon. Gentleman very closely about the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli. I am sure that if he was present for that speech he would agree that it was very important and contained many questions that demand answers from the Government. But the answers should be given at prime time in the Chamber. I hope that, in this short debate on the progress motion, the Government will tell us what is to happen.

Mrs. Gorman rose——

Mr. Bennett: I shall give way reluctantly.

Mrs. Gorman: Members who are not here in the middle of the night are missing not only important subject matter but important speeches. The people about whom I am thinking may be in the minority in this debate, but my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) has sat through 17 days of debate as he has very important material to contribute. He has not yet been called and he may be called in the middle of the night, resulting in the virtual loss of his very important speech. I hope that his material will not be wasted in that way.

Mr. Bennett: I accept that point. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) is one of the Members who questioned my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli.

The next time the Government decide to report progress in the middle of the morning——

Mr. Knapman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, reluctantly.

Mr. Knapman: The hon. Gentleman should be making his points to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). It is rumoured that there is to be an important Liberal party conference—if that is not a contradiction in terms—tomorrow. The hon. Gentleman might benefit from asking the Liberal Member whether he has been given any undertaking with regard to business later today. In that way, the matter might be speedily resolved.

Mr. Bennett: I would not dream of asking the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) what deals he has done behind closed doors. I said at the beginning of my speech that if we were to spend all our time in the Chamber debating deals done behind the scenes we should make very little progress. It was unfair of the Liberal party to vote in favour of holding a key economic debate in the middle of the night, when most of its members intended to go home. However, I am not surprised, as I have on far too many occasions witnessed their opportunism.

Will the Government please tell us how this debate is to be continued rationally? When shall we get answers to the key economic questions put by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli?

Mr. Livingstone: I shall start by saying how much all of us respect the fair way in which you, Mr. Morris, have conducted business today. You look so fresh and entertaining at this time of the day, having been up through the night, that I wonder what you are on. I would not mind some of it.

The past 24 hours have been an absolute travesty. The most important decisions that will ever come before the House of Commons—which will strip the British people of their major economic rights and their ability to exercise them via the democratic will of Parliament—have been pushed through in the dead of night. It is known full well that the media has largely closed down. The exercise has been conducted for the benefit of the Government, who wish to do their sordid business with the minimum of atttention.

The Government have had the despicable and disgraceful co-operation of the Liberal Democrats, who have disappeared so far up the Tory fundament that the soles of their feet barely show at present. The Liberal Democrats will be careering round Newbury in the weeks to come, pimping and prostituting themselves as the defenders of democracy, having sat through the middle of the night and allowed the Government to push through the legislation. Captain Mannering will be popping up and down Newbury telling all and sundry——

The Chairman: Order. Newbury is not relevant to the debate.

Mr. Livingstone: I was hoping that we could continue the debate until the Newbury by-election.

We are in the midst of a debate about the European Monetary Institute, the forerunner of the central bank, and suddenly the Government want to make progress. Is that perhaps because the journalists are now reporting our business?

Mr. Cash: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the leader of the Liberal Democrats has tabled an amendment—which should be discussed in the course of our proceedings—to take out what is described as the jewel in the crown of the British negotiations at Maastricht: the opt-out on economic and monetary union? That amendment is actually in the name of the leader——

The Chairman: Order. That matter has nothing to do with the present debate.

Mr. Livingstone: I think that the hon. Gentleman was referring to amendment No. 400, which forms part of the debate towards which we are moving——

The Chairman: That was the debate that we were having. We are now debating whether that debate should continue. We are not discussing the content of that debate.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. How can we be precluded from discussing the content of amendments that have been selected by you when we are debating whether or not we are to be allowed to discuss the motion before us? It is almost impossible to discuss one without the other.

The Chairman: It is clear that we are debating whether to report progress, not the content of individual amendments.

Mr. Knapman: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. Previously, a closure motion has always been granted immediately. Therefore, will you reconsider the answer that you gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash)?

The Chairman: We can discuss the amendments when we return to them. We are now debating the sole issue of whether to report progress.

Mr. Livingstone: If we report progressnow, what will we have to report? We are halfway through the debate and have not had the vital votes. The Government have not replied to most of the telling questions that have been asked. Many vital issues have been raised to which answers have not been forthcoming. What will the Government do to protect the budget deficit? It has been made clear that if we were to proceed with the treaty before such issues were resolved and the treaty were in operation today, we would now have to move into emergency session to make cuts of £19 billion. How can we report progress when we have not received an answer from the Government on how they would try to square the horrendous circle?

I assume that at some stage the Home Secretary will come to the House to make a statement on the disturbances in Yeovil which are currently taking place. People who feel betrayed are surging on to the streets to demand the resignation of their local Member of Parliament. The news is coming over on the tapes as I speak. There is rioting in Yeovil as ordinary people take to the streets with placards saying, "Paddy, you rat, we want you out".

How can we possibly stop the business until we have had a statement from the Home Secretary? All these matters should be placed before us. We have sat through a disgraceful day for British democracy and now the Government want to shuffle it to one side by closing the debate. Some hon. Members have been here all night. I confess that I was not because I popped home for five hours of shuteye. When I returned I found that in my absence we were committed to a European central bank. The legislation had been pushed through in the small hours as a result of dirty work with the Liberal Democrats who went sliding off to conduct their squalid deals. No doubt they will vote to report progress. Will we have a report on the deals with the Liberal Democrats? Will that be included in the progress report?

In this retrograde move the British people have seen the first major step towards taking away their right to determine our interest rates and the exchange rate for the pound. I was disturbed to hear some of my Front-Bench spokesmen make a fundamental error. I am sure that the Government would want to cover that up: that is why they want to make progress. When I raised the issue of the exchange rate, I was told that ECOFIN would decide the exchange rate of the ecu against the dollar and the yen. How is that determined? The exchange rate of one currency against another is determined by the balance of trade and by the interest rate, which would be set by the central bank. That would effectively determine the exchange rate of the ecu.

No one could possibly sustain an exchange rate that did not reflect the real interest rates vis-à-vis our major competitor currencies. That point has not been answered at all. The Committee is being seriously misled, I am sure inadvertently, and it is being done in the dead of night. It is ridiculous that technically it is still Wednesday, although the rest of the world is already moving on to Thursday. That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not taken any part in our proceedings on the most fundamental issue affecting the future of the British economy, monetary affairs, currency, the exchange rate mechanism and black Wednesday? The whole saga is wrapped up in the debate, but the Chancellor has not been here. A junior Minister, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, has been deputed to discuss all those matters. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) put to him important legal points and he could not answer any of them.

Mr. Livingstone: The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) makes a valuable point about the absence of the Chancellor, who has had a bad time lately. From black Wednesday he has had a bad run and the Budget was not well received. We cannot make progress until the Chancellor has attended to put his views. Frankly, I am sure that he does not believe in most of this old nonsense. That is why he was singing in the bath when we were forced out of the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Skinner: I take great exception to my hon. Friend's statement that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had a bad time. The country has had a bad time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has had a great time. He has been living off the backs of the taxpayer. He has been stopping legal aid for everybody else in Britain and has been picking it up for himself because he got involved with Miss Whiplash and could not get rid of her. He is spending all that money at Threshers, at different places, and his Access card is not in credit. The country is in a mess, the wheels have dropped off the economy and what is he doing? He is singing in the bath. My hon. Friend should rephrase what he has just said.

Mr. Livingstone: It is always refreshing to be reminded by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) of the real class analysis of these matters. I apologise for my slip into moderation. It is a complete travesty that the Chancellor has not been here to present the issues. We know from private briefings to the press that he is clearly not happy and that he thinks it was a mistake to slip into the exchange rate mechanism which, of course, is the first stage of monetary union and the core of the treaty that we have been debating. I saw the Chancellor on "The Frost Interview" on Sunday morning. I was appearing on it myself, to review the morning newspapers. The Chancellor looked much happier outside the exchange rate mechanism than he did when he was in it.

As to the consequences, there were no answers from members of either Front Bench. The real rejection of the Maastricht treaty was cast by voters in France last Sunday, who violently rejected a Government who had gone along with precisely the kind of proposals that were debated tonight.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is becoming too inventive. We must remain in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Livingstone: It would be good if we could, because once the treaty goes through there will not be much of the United Kingdom left.

11.30 am

Mr. Cryer: Will my hon. Friend dwell on the difficulties that would be created by stopping the proceedings now? My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli made an excellent speech in which he outlined the economic difficulties; and the establishment of the central bank was also debated. At this point, we need the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to the Committee to make a response. We do not want to hear from a junior Minister who cannot say anything anyway and who is simply told to keep in line. We should continue and receive a response from the Chancellor—particularly to the debate initiated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli.

Mr. Livingstone: It was not just the economic elements of my right hon. Friend's speech that were striking, but the legal content. Once the treaty goes through, it will not be us who interpret it but judges and European judges. It is all very well Conservative Members being dragooned by their Whips to pass this and that, but they are leaving interpretation of the treaty to judges of a court over which we shall have no influence. What response has been made to that point?

It does not pay respect to the dignity with which you, Mr. Morris, have conducted these proceedings that only junior Ministers have been in attendance rather than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The whole nation will join me in applauding the way in which you, Mr. Morris, have conducted the business of the Committee, which has been very difficult at times.

Mr. Chisholm: Having attended the debate since 6 o'clock last night, I left the Chamber for an hour to catch up with some telephone calls and letters. When I returned, I was appalled to learn that the debate was to be closed. Are the Government interested only in debating key elements of the treaty during the hours of darkness?

The Chairman: Order. The debate has not been closed.

Mr. Chisholm: We want to keep the debate going and I take it that that is the subject of my hon. Friend's remarks.

The Chairman: Order. There is no closure of the debate —just a temporary suspension. The debate will resume in due course.

Mr. Chisholm: It is strange that the Government should want to stop now that we are in the hours of daylight, when they made members of the Committee sit during the night to debate the very heart of the treaty. That was an appalling thing to do. Two important groups of amendments were dealt with by collusion with the Liberal Democrats when many right hon. and hon. Members were not present and others were half-asleep. The least that we can expect is for the Chancellor to come to the Committee to answer the crucial points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who described all the actions that the Government would have to take in stage 2. The junior Minister could not give a reply. We must know what stage 2 will involve in terms of inflation, exchange rates, and so on.

Mr. Livingstone: My hon. Friend makes valid points. I am surprised that no Minister has come to the Dispatch Box to answer. Reporting progress at this stage is like a surgeon performing open-heart surgery cutting open the chest, getting his knife in the heart muscle, and then saying "Shall we stop to report progress?" We do not know what the Government are doing, where they are going, or what they will be sewing up—although clearly they sewed something up with the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Cryer: My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli gave us, in addition to his great Treasury experience, the benefit of his legal knowledge. The certain way to proceed would be for the Attorney-General to come to the Committee. From experience, we cannot depend on any other Minister properly to interpret the legal position. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) will recall that the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), gave one interpretation and the Attorney-General gave another, yet they claim that it is all so simple and straightforward. It is vital that the Attorney-General attends to respond to the points clearly made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli.

Mr. Livingstone: In particular, the Government gave no clear guidance on the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli about what lay in store for us in the move towards an independent central bank. Various other Opposition Members made key points. What we are now debating reverses all that was achieved in the great nationalisation of the Bank of England in 1946; it is based on an absence of serious discussion and on half-baked advice provided by junior Ministers whose words have been completely unconvincing. One of the major achievements of the post-war Labour Government has been unravelled in the middle of the night. We have had no serious debate and no honest answers. I do not think that the Government have worked it out.

Mr. Marlow: I am sorry to return to something that the hon. Gentleman said a few moments ago. He said that it was vital for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come and respond to the debate. I do not whether the hon. Gentleman was here at the time, but my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary talked earlier about article 107, which says that Governments cannot do anything to influence the European system of central banks. The House of Commons will be able to debate issues, but the Government will not be able to say anything. Surely it is worth my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's coming here during the debate on monetary union: if he does not, the only thing that he will have left to say afterwards is goodbye, because the chance will be gone.

Mr. Livingstone: The hon. Gentleman has referred to perhaps the most serious and threatening of all the Maastricht proposals. Not only are we creating the independent European central bank that we have been discussing; not only are its appointees appointed for a single term of seven years—as there is no prospect of their being given a second term, they are free to do what they wish without accountability; but, in voting for the treaty, we waive our rights to influence them. At least the Bundesbank currently comes under pressure from politicians and the Federal Reserve Bank comes under pressure from the President. We have been asked to report progress on a proposal that we waive our rights to exercise similar restraints.

Mr. Rowlands: Is not article 108 equally significant to the sovereignty of the House? If we accept that article, we bind the future legislation of the House of Commons in regard to the statutes of the revised Bank of England. We would have to legislate in strict accordance with the statutes of the European central bank. Not only are we losing the rights of independence; we are losing the right to legislate on our bank in the way that we would wish.

Mr. Livingstone: And, even worse, Mr. Morris——

The Chairman: Even worse, yes. I anticipate the hon. Gentleman. We are not debating the sovereignty of Parliament; we are discussing whether the debate should continue and, if so, why it should continue.

Mr. Livingstone: I consider it vital for the debate to continue, Mr. Morris, so that we can continue to explore——

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I hate to draw your attention again to the hon. Member for Lancaster, but I understand that she is reading a newspaper. As she is very much concerned with our procedures, I thought that I should help her by informing her, through you, that that is not allowed, even in the Gallery.

The Chairman: The hon. Lady is beyond the Bar, but not in the Gallery.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. May I draw your attention to the lamentable lack of knowledge of the rules that has been demonstrated by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer)? Of course, I could not hear what he said, because I was outside the Chamber.

The Chairman: If the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) wishes to engage in a private conversation with the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), I suggest that he goes and buys her a drink.

Mr. Livingstone: I hope that I can remember what I was going to say.

How can we report progress when the points that we have made have not been answered? We have had tremendous assistance from the Opposition Front Bench: I have listened to our leading spokespeople trying to explain the Government's policy, often much more clearly than Ministers and, seemingly, often with much greater agreement than can be seen on the Conservative Benches. Ultimately, however, these remain matters of opinion.

We need the Chancellor and senior Law Officers here to give definitive rulings on the Bill. What would be the impact on the Chancellor if the Bill were passed and we found that the independence of our own central bank were adversely affected? Appointees to the national central banks will serve a five-year term, but we have received no assurance that the system could not be abused politically. Could an outgoing Government stack the board with people on five-year terms so that an incoming Government would be stuck with them?

It is interesting that the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) was reading a newspaper beyond the Bar of the House. She was most probably looking for an account of the debate, but she will not find it because the key issues were decided after the press had gone to print. They will have to compete with today's news. How much of the debate, which should be reported to the British people, will be lost because of momentous events in Russia and elsewhere in the world? The debate should be held in prime time. We should ensure——

Mr. Barry Porter: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I am seeking some information. I am listening with great interest and some amusement to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) and with less interest and amusement to the Cryer-Skinner axis. How long may the debate on the motion to report progress continue? It seems that some members of the Opposition are trying to prolong the debate for no particular reason.

The Chairman: That is a judgment for the Chair.

Mr. Livingstone: It is certainly no part of my plan to prolong the debate, and I make that absolutely clear. I am prepared to say what I want: I want some honest answers. I should be prepared to sit down immediately if we could see the Chancellor's happy form wandering through. We must be told what deals have been done. Is making progress something that has been agreed with the Liberal Democrats and the Welsh nationalists, who were all in the same Lobby earlier? We want to know.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): The Chancellor will not come walking through because he is probably too busy in a Cabinet meeting, deciding how many pits to close.

Mr. Livingstone: It is extremely worrying. How will reporting progress affect the prospect for proper cross-examination of Tarzan later today when he tries to close what remains of the mining industry? I cannot remember his title—is it the President of the Board of Trade, el presidente, lord protector, or whatever he chooses to be known as? The debate must be properly concluded. It would be an insult to the British people if, after a long debate, most of which has taken place when the Galleries were empty because who will come to sit here——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows the rules of the House.

Mr. Livingstone: Nobody else is here but us little mices. The reality is——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman's little mouse was in bed, if I heard him correctly earlier.

Mr. Livingstone: Only for five hours, Mr. Morris. I feel that I could have done with another five hours.

Mr. Chisholm: Some of us have not slept at all because —I say this genuinely—we have been waiting for the Minister to reply to the debate. The group of amendments was brilliantly introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who went through the treaty in a most illuminating way. Anyone who heard his speech will agree with that. He opened up the issue of stage 2 of the treaty. We are waiting for a Minister, preferably the Chancellor, to reply to the many points that my right hon. Friend raised.

Some of us believe that the Chancellor and other members of the Government have been trying to pull the wool over their Back Benchers' eyes to gain their votes without telling them the truth about what is involved in stage 2 and how it affects exchange rate controls and other controls. As my right hon. Friend said, there is a seamless web from stage 2 to stage 3. That aspect of the debate must be dealt with. I have gone without sleep for 36 hours to wait for a reply and I shall not sleep happily until I have heard from a Treasury spokesman.

Mr. Livingstone: I seldom sleep happily when I have heard a Front-Bench Treasury spokesperson speak on any subject.

The Committee decided the way in which we should consider the legislation. Under your guidance, Mr. Morris, the various amendments were arranged into coherent groups. Some of us felt that we should simply start with one amendment and work our way through to the end and perhaps still be here in the year 2000. But you, in your wisdom, Mr. Morris, grouped the amendments. We are now being asked to break off the debate before we have been able seriously to consider the totality of what you thought should be examined together.

For instance, we have not discussed amendment No. 400 and before we report progress we should do so. We have not really discussed in any detail amendment No. 210, tabled by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), which would have tremendous implications for exchange rate policy. Such matters have a dramatic impact on the earlier stages of the debate. It is nonsense to try to shear the debate in half. We cannot report progress halfway through surgery; we should complete the surgery.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): My hon. Friend has been castigating the Liberal Democrats heavily for their secret deal and the way in which they have cosied up with the Government to get this important business through. It has been discussed through the night and perhaps now it will not receive the publicity that my hon. Friend says that it should. Does my hon. Friend realise that the Welsh National party took part in the deal, too—[HON. MEMBERS: "And the Scots."] Last night the Scottish nationalists voted for the closure, but the Welsh nationalists, as part of the deal that they struck three weeks ago on the Committee of the Regions, are continuing to cosy up with the Government, and they have driven through provisions of vital consequence to Wales to be discussed in the middle of the night.

Mr. Livingstone: I share my hon. Friend's worries. Those proceedings seem to show all the worst aspects of politics. Deals have been done out of sight of the public and out of sight of the Chair, in the crooks and crannies of this place—[HON. MEMBERS: "Nooks."]—I mean, the nooks and crannies—in the nooks by the crooks.

Mr. Bill Walker: I happen to think that the Government were right to move the motion and I shall tell the Committee why. Those of us who, unlike the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), have been here all night believe that we should have the opportunity to continue the debate, to which we wish to contribute, with people who are awake and listening. I wish to contribute because these matters will considerably affect Scotland and, indeed, the constitution of the United Kingdom and this unitary Parliament in a way that could lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom. With all due respect to the hon. Gentleman, he should know that the Ministers have sat through the entire debate. The right time to continue it will be when we are all a bit fresher and they have had the opportunity to recharge their batteries and the debate can be scheduled at a time when I hope that it will still catch the attention of the media.

Mr. Livingstone: The hon. Gentleman offers a sensible opinion. If we were being offered a serious debate which would start and finish at a reasonable time, that would unite the Committee. But what happens is that we do not know what will happen until 10 o'clock, and then someone may jump up to move a motion; perhaps we will debate through the night and perhaps we will not. That is not a serious way in which to conduct business. We cannot report progress when people are staggering around. Not everyone has your resilience, Mr. Morris. Many of us feel a lot more ragged at the edges, even though we may have managed to get a bit of shuteye. I dread to think about the poor people who have been up all through the night, such as some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, who are now looking quite dragged.

Mr. Bennett: My hon. Friend and I have taken up quite a bit of time this morning. Does he agree that the whole exercise could have been stopped if a Minister had told us what the Government intended to do for the rest of the day? If they intended to return to the Bill, with the Chancellor making a statement at the beginning of a debate that would end at 10 o'clock, that would be a rational way to behave. It is most objectionable——

Mr. David Davis (Boothferry) rose in this place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

NHS Drugs Bill

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

12.14 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): At long last, Mr. Deputy Speaker! I greatly welcome this delayed opportunity to raise the subject of the cost of drugs to the national health service and to reflect the disquiet which is expressed by a number of people at a perceived trend in Government's thinking, a disquiet which I share. My only regret about this debate is that I am adding to the burdens on the time of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) and I apologise to him for that.

Reduced to simplicity, my concern is that Government policy may unintentionally undermine the smooth running of aspects of the workings of the national health service, to the detriment of patients' interests. I further fear that any extension of the selected list scheme, the SLS, could have long-term adverse repercussions for the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry, an industry which has a significant presence in my Basingstoke constituency. Either development would be undesirable; the possibility of both is alarming.

The greater part of my remarks will be devoted to what I regard as three fallacies in the debate about the size of the drugs bill and about the SLS. The first fallacy relates to a particular policy development. Recently, the Department of Health was understood to have stated that its aim is to keep the rise in the drugs bill in line with retail prices index inflation. I fear that this an inappropriate target.

In view of the continuing recession and deteriorating public finances, it may unfortunately be necessary to keep total NHS spending in line with inflation, despite the 1992 general election commitment to an increase in real terms, but the emphasis on keeping increases in the drugs bill in line with RPI inflation is a disturbing departure and one which should be challenged. Surely the strategic objective should be to ensure that the best use is made of finite resources. How best to achieve this optimum use of finite resources should determine the level of spending on each individual element within the overall total. The factor that determines the size of the bill as a proportion of total NHS expenditure should be whether more or less use of medicines represents the best use of total resources. The Government are, I fear, open to the charge that, in concentrating excessively on one element within total expenditure—the drugs bill—they are losing sight of the wider implications and consequences of such action.

My thesis is simple: further attempts to control the drugs bill are likely to undermine the provision of primary and community health care and, therefore, put greater strain on resources by increasing demand for secondary and more expensive health care.

The second fallacy is the belief that the increase in the drugs bill is significantly due to price increases. That is entirely mistaken. NHS pharmaceutical expenditure has certainly grown ahead of RPI inflation, but this must be seen in its true context. All health care inflation is historically higher than general inflation, for three main reasons. One is demographic change—primarily the aging population. Secondly, there is technological advance, as more and more costly medicines become available. Thirdly, there is apparently insatiable consumer demand.

It is not surprising that the rise in health care costs is an increasing concern for many Governments. Throughout Europe and in the United States, Governments have introduced a variety of measures to contain health care expenditure in general and drugs bills in particular.

My hon. Friend the Minister will know that industry and Department of Health data on the nature of the growth in the NHS drugs bill are complex, but show similar trends. There is a broad consensus on several features. Price rises and the introduction of new products are a consistently small contributor to year-on-year growth, generally accounting for 1 to 2 per cent. each of the total percentage increase.

The Department attributes "product mix", defined as average net ingredient cost, as the main growth. However, the increase in average net ingredient cost has remained steady or slow during the past five years. Conversely, the number of prescription items has increased and now represents a larger percentage of total growth than at any time during the past five years.

The reality is far removed from the mistaken belief that the increase in the drugs bill is significantly due to price increases. It is not difficult to detect the primary cause for the increase in the drugs bill—it is Government policy.

During the past decade or more, there has been a gradual shift from a health service based primarily on secondary, or hospital, provision to a service based on care in the primary sector by general practitioners. The trend has been confirmed by NHS reforms and by moves toward community care, both of which I welcome. The trend was confirmed in the White Paper, "The Health of the Nation". The Government's response to the Tomlinson report, which endorsed fewer hospitals and an increase in primary care, and is further evidence of that trend.

The inevitable corollary of a shift to primary care is the present increase in the NHS drugs bill. Both in absolute terms and as a proportion of total NHS expenditure, it is a classic illustration of money following the patient. A clear correlation can be drawn between the introduction of a new GP contract and the drugs bill. Many instances show how increased prescribing followed the introduction of the new contracts and correspondingly contributed to increases in the drugs bill. Inevitably, more prescriptions are being written and the cost of drugs prescribed has increased the total drugs bill.

The third fallacy is the argument that an ever-increasing drugs bill is taking up too great a share of a finite NHS resource, to the detriment of the service as a whole. Again, the reality is very different. There are many published examples to show that increased expenditure on medicines reduces the overall cost to the health service. Perhaps the most dramatic example has been the reduction in major gastric surgery, which has been brought about by the use of H2-receptor blocking agents, such as Zantac and Tagamet, which, incidentally, were both discovered and developed in the United Kingdom.

One survey shows that those medicines have increased drug costs for ulcer patients sixfold, but have reduced the total treatment costs by 66 per cent. It is therefore entirely misleading merely to judge matters by the increase in the cost of the drugs, when the overall saving to the service can be so much greater. Significantly, the Office of Health Economics calculates that, as a result of the reduction in hospital bed days, savings from seven groups of diseases had amounted to nearly £4 billion a year by 1991. By contrast, the cost of all medicines prescribed in general practice for all diseases in that year was only £3·3 billion. The overall message is simply that medicines are a very cost-effective way of spending health care resources.

I turn, penultimately, to the way forward. I believe that there are questions to be answered, and I put them to my hon. Friend the Minister. First, will not he accept that it is illogical to seek to index-link the growth in the NHS drugs bills to inflation? Secondly, does not he accept that, as Government policy is to shift the balance of health care from hospital provision to treatment by GPs in the primary sector, medicines will consume an ever-higher proportion of total NHS resources? Thirdly, does not he accept that price rises and the introduction of new products are relatively small contributors to the overall rise in the drugs bill? Fourthly, what will be the implications for the provision of health care within the Government's overall strategy if further restrictions on the use of medicines are introduced? Surely this is a matter for an urgent, in-depth inquiry. Lastly, what will be the implications for the pharmaceutical industry if the market is further restricted by an extension of the SLS? The United Kingdom is greatly indebted to the pharmaceutical industry as an investor, employer and innovating producer. Will investment, employment and innovation continue?

My thesis is straightforward. Noises coming from the Department of Health warn that, in their reaction to the rising NHS drugs bill, the Government may be on the point of pursuing a mistaken course of action. Trends within the health service rightly emphasise the importance of primary and community health care. This inevitably results in increased prescribing. But devoting resources to medicines is a most cost-effective use of those resources, as it reduces demand for more expensive secondary health care. An extension of the SLS would have a detrimental effect on the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry, with repercussions for employment and investment.

Finally, further restrictions on the availability of medicines would not be in the patient's interests. They could undermine the reforms and the smooth running of the national health service. I rest my case.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) on his success in the ballot for an Adjournment debate and on his choice of subject.

The question of the cost of drugs to the national health service is a complex one, requiring a balance to be struck between the need to ensure that patients get the drugs they really need, the encouragement of a research-based pharmaceutical industry and the need to contain costs. It is right and proper that those issues should be the subject of public debate.

I must start by correcting something my hon. Friend said at the beginning of his speech. It is not, as he suggested, our aim to keep the rise in the drugs bill in line with GDP inflation. But it is our aim to reduce the annual rise in the drugs bill to something closer to the rate of inflation.

Over the 10 years 1982-83 to 1991-92 the total drugs bill for the NHS in England rose from £1·2 billion to £2·9 billion—an increase of 39 per cent. in real terms. Over those 10 years, the cost of drugs prescribed in the family health service has risen from 8·2 per cent. of total expenditure on the NHS in England to 8·7 per cent. Indeed, in 1989-90 it was as high as 9·2 per cent. In total, expenditure on the family health service drugs bill reached £2·3 billion in England in 1991-92, and is likely to increase by a further 14 per cent. this year.

The reasons for the rise in the family health service drugs bill are complex and, not surprisingly, the Government's analysis differs in some respects from the industry's. As we have in Britain a good record of co-operation between industry and the Government, we are keen to reconcile those differences. We have, therefore, agreed that officials of the Department will meet the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industry to discuss our respective analyses, and seek to agree a common basis for assessing the causes of the rise in the NHS drugs bill. Undoubtedly, some of the rise is due to changes in demography, but we should not exaggerate the importance of those factors. Much more important is the fact that doctors have been writing more prescriptions per head of the population and that those prescriptions have been becoming more and more expensive. Over the 10-year period, the number of prescriptions has risen from 332 million to 415 million—an increase of a quarter. We expect the number of prescriptions to rise by a further 4 per cent. this year. The average cost of a prescription has risen from £3·04 to £5·58, an increase of 84 per cent. in cash terms or 10 per cent. in real terms.

One issue on which we can broadly agree is that increases in the prices of medicines that are already on the market have not contributed very much to the increased cost. Over the past five years, the average ingredient cost of a prescription has gone up by just under 8 per cent. each year. Of that 8 per cent., only about 1 per cent. is due to price increases for medicines already on the market. Just over 1 per cent. of the annual 8 per cent. increase has been due to a continuing rise in the average quantity of medicine in each prescription. But the bulk of the rise in the average cost of a prescription is accounted for by what might best be described as the product mix—changes in the medicines that are being prescribed. Newer medicines are taking the place of the older medicines whose prices, as we have seen, have not been increasing very much. Those new medicines have a very substantial price premium over existing medicines—on average about 150 per cent.—even when they are very similar in therapeutic effect. The switch to newer medicines has been offset to some extent by an increase in the proportion of prescriptions that could be dispensed using generic medicines, which has risen from 16 per cent. in 1982 to 35 per cent. in 1992.

Of course, people are becoming more health conscious. Some new medicines are more effective than older ones, while some new medicines treat conditions that previously could not be treated at all. But, likewise, there is no bottomless pit of cash for the health service. It is all the more important, therefore, for us to seek to ensure that the money that is spent on medicines is well spent. Our policies seek to ensure that by action on two main fronts—first, to ensure that we are not paying more than we need to for an effective range of modern medicines and, secondly, to encourage better prescribing.

The proposals for the extension of the selected list are part of the first of these areas of action. As my hon. Friends knows, the selected list scheme was introduced in 1985 and included seven therapeutic categories of drugs. Experience with the scheme has shown that the drugs bill can be reduced without detriment to patients, and we have therefore asked the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs to see whether similar savings can be made in other categories.

There are no targets for savings from extending the selected list scheme and decisions on which individual drugs may no longer be available on NHS prescription will be taken only on the basis of advice from the advisory committee. That is an independent body of experienced doctors, dentists and pharmacists who have been appointed, following nomination by the relevant professional organisations. Their remit is to ensure that drugs to meet all real clinical need can be provided as economically as possible under the NHS.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and for his courtesy in the recent past when I have been to see him about the selected list. Will he give us the make-up of the advisory committee and state, in particular, whether it contains any young women who are likely to be taking oral contraceptives? As he knows, I am most concerned that adding oral contraceptives to the limited list could cause much distress to young women taking the pill. The change in prescription can have a profound effect, not just on the women's physical reaction, but on their mood. The long-term effects of giving up oral contraceptives could be an increase in abortions and in the cost of maintaining unwanted children. As my hon. Friend said, we could be penny wise and pound foolish.

Mr. Sackville: I shall let my hon. Friend have a complete list of the members of the committee. I assure her that they represent a fair cross-section and that the committee contains a number of experts on oral contraception who will be well aware of the factors that my hon. Friend has outlined. I look forward to receiving further representations from her if she wishes to make them.

I was speaking about the general criteria. Drugs will not be rejected purely on grounds of cost and the committee will take full account of patients' needs as well as the therapeutic value of the drugs under review.

We cannot predict which products will be affected by those changes, but I can offer reassurance that manufacturers will be informed as soon as possible if their products are to be considered by the committee. They will also be given an opportunity to make representations to the committee against any provisional view that a product should not be prescribable under the NHS.

I appreciate that there is concern about the timing of the changes and, while it is not possible at this stage to announce the dates on which the committee will be reviewing the drugs in the new therapeutic categories, preliminary work is already under way and we intend to announce further details of the products involved later in the year.

I know that there is serious concern about the impact that the changes may have on research, investment and employment in the drugs industry. The changes that we are introducing mirror measures being taken throughout Europe to limit the growth of drugs bills. Investment in the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry and decisions on product development depend on a number of factors in both the United Kingdom and other key pharmaceutical markets. Therefore, it is not possible to identify separately the impact of the proposed extension to the selected list scheme from that of other changes in both the United Kingdom and other countries.

In the same area are the arrangements for controlling, indirectly, the price of branded prescription drugs sold to the NHS through the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. This is a voluntary agreement, negotiated between the Department of Health and the pharmaceutical industry, which regulates the profits that companies may make from the sale of drugs to the NHS.

The present scheme, which was agreed in 1986, is now being renegotiated with the ABPI. The scheme has been successful in its purpose of making drugs available to the NHS at reasonable prices while encouraging the development of a strong and innovative pharmaceutical industry.

It is essential that any new agreement continues to achieve those objectives. The scheme is voluntary, of course, and depends on the co-operation of the industry. The discussions taking place between the Department and industry representatives involve a recognition by both sides that the rate of growth in the drugs bill needs to be limited, and that constraint in the pricing of new drugs has a role to play, along with the other initiatives that I have mentioned.

As well as ensuring that we are not paying more than we need for an effective range of modern medicines, we are also taking action to encourage better prescribing. Let me stress the word "better". We are seeking to improve the care of patients, not just to cut costs, although, of course, cutting out wasteful and unnecessary prescribing is part of improving prescribing. I have time to refer only briefly to the steps that we are taking.

First, all GPs are given details of their prescribing costs every month through prescribing analyses and cost data —PACT. Secondly, professional advice about prescribing is now available in all family service authorities through the medical advisers and, increasingly, also through pharmaceutical advisers. Those advisers are the NHS's main resource in the field, working through the regular face-to-face visits to GPs. In addition, all FHSAs, regions, and my Department now have electronic access to PACT data on a monthly basis. We now have the means to analyse variation from the GP across regions. Understanding what is happening is clearly vital if we are to target further initiatives to improve prescribing.

Finally, there are the fund-holding and indicative prescribing schemes. We have just introduced a new drug budget system for the indicative prescribing and fund holding schemes. The new system retains budget setting at practice level based on identified need, but it also ensures that budgets, when aggregated, are set with regard to the estimated requirements for prescribing at regional and national level.

GP fund holders have a direct interest in improving the cost effectiveness of prescribing. They can retain any savings on drugs to reduce the demand on the hospital referral element of their budget. That is not just theory. In 1991-92, fund holders' prescribing costs increased by an average of 3 per cent. less than those of other GPs—and without any loss of quality. And that was starting from a baseline cost 10 per cent. lower than other GPs. All the indications are that that trend will be repeated this year.

Up to now, however, the majority of GPs have had no direct incentive to prescribe economically, because there has been no visible and direct reward for the patients in their practices. On 11 March, my hon. Friend the Minister for Health invited regions to submit proposals for incentive schemes for GPs who prescribe economically. Those schemes will have to be agreed with the Department. If acceptable, they will operate on a pilot basis from 1 April. GPs whose prescribing costs fall below a target level will be able to retain part of their savings to spend on improving services for their patients.

I echo my hon. Friend's remarks and I want to acknowledge and to applaud the major contribution that the pharmaceutical industry makes to the economy of the country. The pharmaceutical industry in Britain has a record of which it can be proud, in terms of production, exports, research and employment. Although Britain is only 3 per cent. of the world market, our industry provides some 6 per cent. of the world production, making us the sixth largest producer. In 1991, the industry in Britain had record exports of £2·5 billion, and a record balance of trade surplus of £1·2 billion. Much of that success is due to a record on innovation which is second to none, thanks to the quality of its research efforts. I understand that investment in R and D reached £1·2 billion in 1991, which represents some 8 per cent. of the world R and D expenditure. The industry employs more than 87,000 people in the United Kingdom, of which some 18,000 are scientists and technicians working on medical research and development.

We are all well aware of that fine record, and we do not wish to cause any harm, but we must ensure that the money that is spent on medicines is well spent. I have tried to show that we are addressing this need in a balanced way through a number of different schemes—striving both to ensure that we are not paying more than we need to or more than is reasonable for an effective range of modern medicines, and to encourage better prescribing. I have also tried to show that we are not deaf to the legitimate needs and concerns of the industry, and that we will take those into account as we take our policies forward.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef Special Premium

1. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will be taking to reduce bureaucracy involved in the beef special premium.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): We are operating the new beef special premium scheme as simply and as flexibly as we can, within the framework laid down by the European Community rules and remembering the need to make sure that public money is fully accounted for.

Mr. Pickthall: Does the Minister agree with Mr. Richard Cowan, the head of the Ministry's beef division, that no sane person could have devised the beef special premium scheme? Does he agree that the introduction of the CID passports will create immense problems for farmers, particularly in relation to the larger cattle markets? Does he further agree that in conjunction with the integrated administration and control scheme—IACS—bureaucracy, which will come in too late for farmers, they will have too little time to complete the forms, so many of them may be brought close to despair? Will he further agree that if he can take decisive steps to ameliorate this nonsense, he will have done something tangible to put alongside the vaunted campaign by the President of the Board of Trade to reduce over-regulation and red tape?

Mr. Gummer: I am extremely enthusiastic about getting rid of over-regulation and red tape. That is why I introduced a Bill to abolish the milk marketing boards and to take powers to abolish the Potato Marketing Board. I am sad that the hon. Gentleman was here voting against both those deregulation measures two days ago.

The beef arrangements are not what I should like, because there are two payments of premium, not one. One would facilitate a simpler system, but, because of this system, we have to have what we propose, and it will be as simple as we can make it.

Under the IACS scheme we will pay out large sums of money to the public. Farmers will have six weeks to fill in the forms, which are as simple as we can make them. They have been carefully written—I have taken great care over them. I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that farmers will be pleased with the results, which will be much better than those in many other countries.

Mr. Marland: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in addition to the extra office work that this involves, it will also involve farmers in a considerable amount of extra work handling cattle—they have to be handled on several more occasions, to check their tags and the documentation? My right hon. Friend will not be aware, but he may be interested to know, that my next-door neighbour has 200 cattle—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ask a question."] I have asked a question. It took three men almost half a day to sort those cattle out. Is it really impossible to go back to the old system?

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry, but it is impossible; otherwise, my hon. Friend's neighbour would not be able to get the money that he deserves, and it is likely that the money would go to people who should not get it. If my hon. Friend's neighbour fails to get the money that he wants, deserves and needs, the first person to whom he will complain will be my hon. Friend. I am insistent that he should not be put to that trouble as well.

Mr. Tyler: May I press the Minister a little more on the timing of the integrated administration and control scheme forms? He said just now that farmers would have six weeks to fill them in. Can he guarantee that the forms will be in farmers' hands by 1 April, All Fools' day? Can he tell us, if he cannot give that guarantee and six weeks cannot therefore be used for the purpose, whether he will postpone the deadline?

Mr. Gummer: There will be no question of a delay, because we are trying to stop fraud throughout the Community. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends are always pressing on that matter, and I entirely support that. We will meet the deadline. The forms will be out to farmers by 2 April—I chose that date as being a little more elegant than the one the hon. Gentleman would like—and that will give people six weeks to fill in the forms.

We have continually reminded farmers that they will need to have certain maps beforehand. Press releases have again been issued this week reminding people of the need to do that. The Ordnance Survey has done its best to provide those facilities and, as long as people get in touch with it before 17 April, they will have the full one-stop shop arrangements from the Ordnance Survey. My fellow Ministers and I will be available to help them in that respect. We will do everything that we can to ensure that Britain does better than anyone else.

Mr. Marlow: We all sympathise very deeply with the difficulty in which my right hon. Friend finds himself. However, if the scheme runs into the sand, as some people believe is likely, could my right hon. Friend send a party to Italy to see how they do it there, because I am sure that they will have it fixed up quite nicely?

Mr. Gummer: If my hon. Friend had supported the Government in the Lobbies last night and on previous nights, we should be in a position to deal with such matters much more effectively. If my hon. Friend would put his vote where his mouth is, that would be much more helpful.

English Fishing Industry

2. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the state of the English fishing industry.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): The most pressing immediate problem facing the fish catching industry is the weak state of the market.

Mr. Mitchell: Instead of blaming the fishermen for the bankruptcy that they face and instead of compounding that bankruptcy by the insanity of days-at-sea limitations, why does not the Minister act? Why does he not deal with the small haddock crisis by increasing the minimum landing sizes? Why does he not ban the landing of round fish? Why does he not increase mesh sizes? Why does he not deal with Russian imports on a temporary basis, with a dumping ban? Why does he not provide the same kind of financial support for the industry as that provided by the French? Why does he not suspend the Sea Fish (Conservation) Bill and talk to the industry? Most of all, why does he not stand up for fishing instead of lecturing——[Interruption.]

Mr. Curry: And why does the hon. Gentleman not think for himself instead of simply repeating every prejudice of the fishing industry? He would do fishermen a greater service if he did that. And why does he not think of his own constituents and the large number of people in the processing industry whose jobs depend on an adequate supply of fish? We will tackle the problem of small fish if the whole of the British industry will agree. We are asking its opinion and we will await the response from Northern Ireland and Scotland. I can act only if there is agreement. We will wait and see whether there is agreement. I have my doubts.

Mr. Harris: If there is another blockade by fishermen tomorrow—we hope that there will not be—will my hon. Friend accept that such action stems from a feeling of despair among many of our fishermen, not least in the south-west? However, will he cast some light on imports, particularly from Russia, and tell us exactly how much fish is being imported from Russia and how much cod is being landed by our own fishermen?

Mr. Curry: I hope that the industry will not resume its saga of blockade, demonstration and destruction of fish, particularly as recent signs are that fish prices have firmed considerably. That is what we said would happen. Perhaps that has happened because fishermen have been demonstrating so much that they have not been catching so many fish and fewer fish have been landed.

The prices of cod, haddock and plaice are roughly at last year's level and I am glad about that. That is very good news indeed. However, it shows that the whole of the problem does not lie with imported fish. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) acknowledged implicitly, there is a problem with small fish in the marketplace. There have also been very heavy landings of cod in Humberside. Some estimates state that twice as much cod is being landed as was landed this time last year from the north Norway fisheries.

It is difficult to know the precise quantities of Russian fish. Some of it is imported by the British fishing organisations themselves. However, it is certainly not enough to account for the whole of the problem in the market. We must look within our own industry to discover the reasons for some of those problems. If we look objectively, we can find the answers.

Mr. Salmond: Are not the short tempers and insults from the Government Front Bench a combination of panic and guilt about the situation in the fishing industry? When the Minister meets the English fisheries, will he synchronise that meeting with the Scottish fisheries Minister so that they both accept their inescapable responsibility for the destabilisation of the fish market at the present time? What measures is the Minister taking to improve the situation for English and Scottish fishermen?

Mr. Curry: The English and Welsh fishermen are telling us at the moment that they wish to ban imports of Russian cod. However, the Scottish Fishermen's Federation tells us that it does not want to ban those imports because it depends on the Klondiking fee for the sale of herring later in the season. As the two major parts of the industry are diametrically opposed, it makes it more difficult than it would be for fisheries Ministers if the two parts held the same point of view, and that point of view was sensible.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my hon. Friend time and again continue to repeat, for all the people of the fishing industry, the need for conservation? The sort of attacks that we have heard today do not take any account of the need to safeguard fish for the future, which we shall not have without the proper conservation measures.

Mr. Curry: I will certainly repeat that. My hon. Friend will be happy to know that we think that we are very close to agreement with the industry on a fully fledged conservation forum, to look at all the conservation measures, in which the Scottish and Northern Ireland industries will participate. The only problem is that, yesterday, the English fishing industry suggested that it was getting last-minute hesitations because it wished me to defer the Sea Fish (Conservation) Bill entirely before it would talk. As we have made it clear that that was not a possibility and that technical conservation cannot provide all the answers, it would be very silly if it withdrew from that forum at the last minute. Conservation means the future of the fishery—if there are no fish, there is no future. Fish depend on conservation.

Mr. Morley: Does the Minister accept his responsibility for fisheries management? What kind of management is it that produces a fish famine before Christmas and cod mountains in the new year? Will he take action on round fish and minimum landing sizes? Above all, will he have genuine talks with the fishermen and take the opportunity of surplus fish to bring in proper conservation measures? He should consider them as an alternative to the Sea Fish (Conservation) Bill, which has been widely rejected.

Mr. Curry: Before the hon. Gentleman invites me to start regulating the amount of fish that must be landed from north Norway and to regulate every single day's catch by the fishing industry, he should think rather harder. We have producer organisations with responsibility for managing the fisheries. We have suggested how they can manage them more effectively, but they do not want to do it that way; they want to be left to do it their own way. We will do our best to eke out the fishery throughout the whole year, but those organisations have their role to play as well. It is not good enough for the industry always to find somebody else to blame for its problems. We will keep talking to the industry, but it must accept that there is a problem in the management which must be solved by the industry, as well as by me.

Self-sufficiency

3. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the duration of United Kingdom self-sufficiency in food in the event of docks and airports being unavailable.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nicholas Soames): Food stocks would be sufficient to maintain the current levels of supplies in the United Kingdom if port and airport facilities were disrupted. In the unlikely event of long-term disruption, adequate supplies of food would still be likely to be available.

Mr. Dickens: I thank my hon. Friend for his reassurance. Does he accept that we owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to the farmers of the United Kingdom, and that self-sufficiency in food is of paramount importance? It is no good having the greatest nuclear deterrent in the world and placing ourselves in a position to have to submit through starvation. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Let us hear the answer.

Mr. Soames: I think that my hon. Friend would do extremely well in those difficulties. He is perfectly correct in recognising that British farmers and growers are second to none in the world in the efficiency of their production. It is nevertheless true that we need to do more to ensure that the marketing of our food is better. If we were at any time placed in the difficult circumstances that my hon. Friend has described, I hope that he would take comfort from Mr. Jonathan Porritt, as reported in The Star today, and eat squirrels.

Fishing

4. Mr. Bowden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will meet a representative group of south coast fishermen to discuss the implementation of EC fishing regulations.

Mr. Curry: Yes.

Mr. Bowden: Is my hon. Friend aware that the fishermen in my area are very responsible—they have been following my advice not to involve themselves in any illegal or criminal action—but their patience is wearing thin? Is he further aware that a group of them went over to continental ports and found that there was no effective operation by fisheries inspectors and that the fishermen were getting away with murder by landing undersized fish and not obeying quotas? Is not it about time that we had a level playing field in the fishing industry?

Mr. Curry: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Effective control means effective conservation in fisheries. Our proposals will tighten up the controls and inspect the inspectorate. We are considering the use of more advanced technology to discover what is happening in the fishing industry. I shall take those matters up with the new French Government immediately. There does not seem to be a great deal of point in taking them up with the old French Government. My hon. Friend will accept that we are not wholly innocent in these matters, as Opposition Members will acknowledge.

Mr. Ainger: Is the Minister aware that last week I was in the Commission building with Mr. Paleokrassas's chef de cabinet, who was abusive of nation states that did not implement the regulations that the Commission issued on 22 and 25 February on the size, health, quantity and minimum price of fish? Is he further aware that fishermen in Britain still complain that, in some markets, the minimum price is not being reached? What does he intend to do about that?

Mr. Curry: As I explained to the fishing organisations yesterday, we have been in touch with Customs and Excise and we have made sure that we have a proper system of control, not merely on the minimum import price but on the weight of the fish being landed, to ensure that there is no fiddling. That will put a floor in the market. The answer lies not in banning imports, given the damage that that would do to our processing sector and the ultimate consumer, but in ensuring that fish is landed at a fair price. This afternoon, the Commission will make proposals for more effective monitoring of landings by third-country vessels to ensure that they, too, observe the minimum price and hygiene rules. That is a measured response to a crisis. We must not let it get out of proportion, but the marketplaces suggest that what we expected to happen is happening, and that is good news for fishermen.

Support Policies (Prices)

5. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effects agriculture support policies have on the prices charged to consumers.

Mr. Gummer: The consumer will benefit from the move to lower support prices, which form the basis of the recent CAP reform.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the work of Dr. Brian Burkitt, a specialist on EC finances at Bradford university, who has produced a report that says that most of the £10 billion net that we have contributed went to the CAP? He also tells us in that report that for every £3 spent by the British people on food, £1 could be saved if we were to open our markets to food imports from other parts of the world. Is that not a better way to put a bit of butter on people's bread than paying out to the farmers?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that my hon. Friend would not wish the farmers of Essex in and surrounding her excellent constituency to find themselves unable to look after the land or to produce the food to which our hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) referred earlier. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that we are proud of what our farmers do in producing a high proportion of the food that we eat. We want to encourage them to sell more in the new home market of the single market. I know that my hon. Friend will want to support us in doing that, through her support for the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: Does the Minister recognise that there is considerable public hostility to the CAP, especially as so many of its resources are devoted to the storage and disposal of unwanted surpluses, and when 80 per cent. of its resources go to the 20 per cent. richest farmers? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that money needs to be redirected towards environmental protection, improving the landscape and more extensive agriculture, all of which would help to support more small farmers?

Mr. Gummer: Surely the hon. Gentleman, who represents an agricultural constituency, has noticed that, in the CAP reform, the British Government were able to secure a wholehearted change from the original proposals so that environmental improvement is now at the heart of that policy. That is a British achievement and I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman, even if he is partisan in other things, would wish to congratulate the Government on that success.

Small Farms

6. Mr. Amess: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new measures are being contemplated to assist small farms.

Mr. Curry: Our policy does not distinguish between farms according to size. Our plans to reform agricultural tenancies should, however, help people to enter the industry through liberalising the rented sector.

Mr. Amess: Will my hon. Friend accept that the 28 farms and smallholdings in my constituency of Basildon welcome the proposals that he has just outlined? Will he recognise that many of those farmers support the deregulation of farming as they complain to me that they seem to have more forms to fill in than animals to feed?

Mr. Curry: The people of Basildon are the first to demand firm controls and clear accountability when spending taxpayers' money. That is why they re-elected my hon. Friend to represent them—the result which shook the world, or at least the BBC. My hon. Friend can assure the smallholders and taxpayers of Basildon that we have the lightest and simplest controls consistent with ensuring that their money is properly spent.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister agree that the best thing that he could do to help small farms would be to make productive the set-aside land that is now running to waste? If it were used to grow biodiesel fuels, 750,000 tonnes could be grown, 7,000 jobs would be created and we should become less dependent on imported fuel. Biodiesel fuel is environmentally friendly. Why have France and Germany roared ahead with the mass production of biodiesels when all that we have is three buses running on such fuel? Why have we been so laggardly?

Mr. Curry: The very small farmers do not have to set aside land. The real answer lies with the non-rotational scheme. That gives the possibility of planting crops, of biomass, of woodland and of recreational purposes—opportunities which are not realistic under rotational set-aside. We plan to build the non-rotational scheme to give just those advantages.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

7. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current number of bovines diagnosed as suffering from BSE.

Mr. Soames: Up to 19 March, 89,014 cases have been confirmed since 1986. New suspects are being reported at a higher rate than last year because animals born immediately before the July 1988 ruminant feed ban are now reaching the age at which disease is most likely to occur. However, the rate of increase has slowed dramatically.

Mr. Evans: I thank the Minister for his reply. Does he agree that if we had listened to the rantings of that lot opposite, there would not be a British beef industry? It is only as a result of my hon. Friend and his Ministry keeping their nerve that the British beef industry is in such good heart. When these beasts get the disease, do they jump up and down, do they shake their heads, do they lose their way and do they have glazed eyes? Does that remind my hon. Friend of that lot opposite? Would it be a good idea for my hon. Friend to send a senior vet down to Walworth road this afternoon?

Mr. Soames: The House will be pleased to hear that a live test is about to become a fact of life. My hon. Friend may find it convenient to offer that test to the Leader of the Opposition. My hon. Friend is perfectly correct on the more substantial point. The scaremongering attached to this serious matter has not helped. My hon. Friend is also entirely correct in that the findings of the Southwood report and of the Tyrrell report, all the proper, fully constituted and substantiated scientific evidence that has been placed before the House and everything that we have laid before the House are going entirely according to plan. The disease is working its way through the system and we hope that we shall shortly see some substantial progress.

Dr. Strang: As the experiment that the Minister set up to establish whether there is maternal transmission of BSE from cow to calf will not be concluded for another three years, would it be a wise, precautionary measure to implement the recommendation of the Select Committee on Agriculture and to extend the offal sales ban to all animals, including animals under the age of six months?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. There is no evidence that there is maternal transmission; if it were a significant factor in the epidemic, we should have seen it now. Even if it does occur, it will not prevent the epidemic from disappearing. The question of the various other animal feeds has been around for some time, and both our professional scientific advisers have not felt it necessary to implement a ban.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will my hon. Friend endorse the basic scientific research into BSE which is being conducted by the Medical Research Council, whose painstaking work on the different types of scrapie is most likely to bring the answer soonest, although it does not seem likely to be the answer offered by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang)?

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend is right. The scientific research into this difficult and serious matter has been painstakingly and brilliantly conducted by a wide range of scientists from not only the Medical Research Council but the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Central Veterinary Laboratory and others. My hon. Friend will be pleased to note that the increase in newly reported cases has slowed dramatically. There was an 80 per cent. increase between early 1991 and early 1992, but an increase of only 8 per cent. between early 1992 and 1993. Science has done us well and we look forward to the proper conclusion of this matter as the disease gradually works its way out of the system.

Common Agricultural Policy

8. Mr. McFall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate in pound sterling of total expenditure throughout the EC under the CAP for 1993.

Mr. Gummer: A total of £28,000 million to about 8 million farmers, who provide the food for more than 320 million people.

Mr. McFall: When will the Government take an initiative to reduce the spiralling costs of the CAP, which already are unacceptable? Does he agree with Michael Jacquot, the EC controller, that they will remain within the 1994 budget guidelines only by creative accounting? Do not the MacSharry proposals only increase the costs of this policy to the EC taxpayer?

Mr. Gummer: That is why we got rid of the MacSharry proposals and replaced them with our own. That is what the CAP reform achieved. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that we are seeking to reduce, and have reduced, the resource costs of the CAP. I hope that he will accept that the nation that battles most to keep the CAP within budget is the United Kingdom. I hope that he will ask his hon. Friends to accept that, if we manage to do so, they cannot continue to demand more and more for different groups of farmers while complaining about the bill.

Mr. Oppenheim: As Opposition Members have clearly come to the sophisticated and intelligent conclusion that trade barriers and subsidies for agriculture harm taxpayers and consumers, why have they not reached the same conclusion for coal? As they are such keen advocates——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is moving away from the CAP. Can he keep his question to the CAP?

Mr. Oppenheim: As they are such keen advocates of industrial policy and intervention, which is exactly what the common agricultural policy is, why do not they praise the results of the policy—immense damage to third-world sugar producers, huge burdens on taxpayers and consumers and unsustainable surpluses?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is perfectly entitled to fight the Labour party with the enthusiasm that is so characteristic of him, but he would not find it so easy to do so if the farmers of Amber Valley and of surrounding areas were not given reasonable support to look after the land and produce the food that we need. I hope that he will support the way in which the Government have fought to ensure that developing countries, particularly those to which we owe so much in the West Indies, have a continued market for their bananas.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We all welcome the Fontainebleau rebate, but has not its existence prevented British Ministers from demanding a fundamental review of CAP finances? Are not we, in effect, compromised?

Mr. Gummer: No, certainly not. The hon. Gentleman has not grasped the fact that British Ministers have won their battles in the European Community and that the CAP reform is designed on what Britain wanted. There was no single major element of our negotiating list that we failed to secure in those negotiations. The hon. Gentleman would do well to follow that example, but he will not have the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. John Greenway: When my right hon. Friend meets the new French Minister for Agriculture, who will be appointed soon following the annihilation of the socialists in France, will he remind him that the common agricultural policy reforms ensured a level field for producers and that there will be no going back on those reforms and the need for a GATT settlement?

Mr. Gummer: I look forward to meeting my new French counterpart when he or she is appointed and to discussing with that person the need for Britain and France to ensure that the European Community provides a proper basis for competitive farming, from which both British and French farmers will benefit. I join in my hon. Friend's pleasure at seeing sister parties winning the elections in France and proving again that socialism is dead.

French Fishermen (Attacks)

9. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the French authorities to protect consignments of British fish from attacks by French fishermen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Both the French Agriculture and Fisheries Ministers gave my right hon. Friend and myself undertakings in Brussels last week about the safety of British agriculture and fish products. We may need to update those shortly.

Mr. Donohoe: Given the obvious frustration among both the French and British fishing communities, not least because of the massive downturn in fish prices at the quayside which they are having to put up with, why do prices in the shops remain at a high level? Given that fact, will the Minister instigate an inquiry?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman has to distinguish between fish arriving in frozen blocks for processing—the largest part—and fresh fish that is landed. There is no great surplus of certain types of fish. The heart of the problem is the large-scale landing, both of cod into Humberside and of small fish into the Scottish and other ports, which are pulling down the market. There is a similar problem in France. The answer lies in tackling any abuses of imports, which the Community has acted to do, and in addressing how to manage fisheries better within the United Kingdom and France, including control.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there are many more people employed in the fish processing industry than in fishing and that it is important that there are adequate supplies of fish for the industry to process and for the consumer to eat?

Mr. Curry: That is exactly the case. The largest part of fish is sold not on the fresh market but in the processed market. It goes into fish fingers and fish and chip shops. That market depends heavily on imported products. The last thing that would help the long-term future of the industry would be to drive the consumer away through shortage when there are readily available competing proteins at low prices.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Although it is clear that compensation for British fishermen and imports must be tackled, does the Minister accept that we shall not solve the crisis in the fishing industry as long as the traditional distrust between those who catch and those who process persists? Therefore, will the Minister get together with both sides of the industry and look at ways to regulate the market better and, perhaps even more important, at ways in which the market for fish can be expanded, so that this wholesome food becomes a regular part of people's diet rather than an occasional product that they have when they can afford it?

Mr. Curry: I have tried to do exactly what the hon. Gentleman suggested. Yesterday, I met fishing industry representatives from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the processors. I suggested to each side that they might like to meet the other, either under my chairmanship or simply in my office. The processors were agreeable, but the fishing industry refused to do so.

Dr. Strang: As the Minister has acknowledged that imports are part of the problem in both the French and the British markets, was not it unhelpful, to say the least, for the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to say earlier this week that prime responsibility for the problems facing the British industry lies with British fishermen? As the Council of Fisheries Ministers has accepted that the minimum import price arrangements have not been working, are not we entitled to attach a great deal of store to its proposals for more effective control of direct landings by ships of third countries, which the Minister announced that the Commission was to make public earlier today?

Following what the Minister said about the processing and catching sides of the industry, does he agree that there is a strong case for having a summit of all the interests to see whether they can come up with more effective collective action to stop a repetition of these problems?

Mr. Curry: The Commission proposal on making sure that landings from third-country vessels observe the same standards as we require came from me, so I am very pleased that, as I understand it, that is to be carried forward by the Commission. My right hon. Friend was stating the obvious. There are various strands in this crisis. One of them is imported fish, but it has been very much exaggerated. There have also been very large landings on Humberside of fish from north Norway. Some estimates put this at double the amount landed by this time last year. There is also a lot of very small fish on the market. It is true that the Government have responsibility, but the industry, too, must look at how it can manage its fisheries more effectively. That is why we are consulting on certain measures that might address the problem of small fish on the market.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has heard the reports from Weymouth. Despite the fishing disputes all round France and Britain, our port has been open to all fishermen. We gave a warm welcome to French fishermen who wanted to unload their catches there. Will he ask his colleagues in the European Community if they would like to be as communautaire as Weymouth fishermen and Weymouth fish docks and perhaps follow the example that we are setting in Dorset?

Mr. Curry: The fishermen in my hon. Friend's constituency are behaving in the long-term interests of their industry. We have had some 89 requests now for safe passage of our products through France according to the system that we set up. They have been responded to and trade is now flowing much more normally. We should give credit for the fact that, after a period of delays, we are now getting free access to the French market, as we demanded, and the promises are being observed.

Export for Slaughter

10. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on current progress towards improving welfare provision for animals exported live for slaughter.

Mr. Gummer: I raised this at the last Agriculture Council and the Commission has agreed to bring forward proposals for further measures to protect the welfare of animals in transit. The present circumstances are not satisfactory and we will continue to press until we get a very much better answer.

Mr. Lewis: I accept the Minister's response, but may I remind him of his statements during our EC presidency when he gave every indication that the matter was to be tackled more urgently? Is he aware that there has been a very large increase in the numbers of animals being exported? He will be aware that we have recommenced exporting to Spain. That cannot be good for the animals and every welfare organisation in the country is opposed to what is going on at the moment. I ask for even more urgency on a matter that we have discussed on many occasions in the House.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman and I are not far apart on the matter. We are seeking to ensure that the standards of animal transport throughout Europe are raised to the standards in this country. I hope very much that we can ensure that the rest of Europe learns about animal welfare from us. We have a lot to learn from them, perhaps, in our treatment of children and old people, but we have much to teach them on animals.

Mr. Gale: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, while some issues can benefit from subsidiarity, environmental matters in general, and animal welfare matters in particular, require a European approach? Will he confirm that Her Majesty's Government will not agree to any standards for animal welfare, particularly with regard to animals in transit in Europe, that are lower than those that constitute current practice in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Gummer: There is no question of the welfare of farm animals being dealt with as a matter of subsidiarity. These are matters which bear directly on a common agricultural policy and we want the same standards throughout Europe. I have made it clear that I am not introducing unilateral measures in this country; I am insisting that the standards rise throughout Europe. There are very important areas in which subsidiarity should be applied, but this is not one of them.

Mr. Martyn Jones: The Minister will agree that the best thing for animal welfare would be for all animals to be slaughtered as close as possible to the point of production. What measures is he taking, in conjunction with the Agriculture Council, to encourage that in Europe generally and in Britain in particular?

Mr. Gummer: It will be a great help when we have, throughout Europe, slaughterhouses that are recognised by every part of Europe as reaching the same standards. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the more meat that can be carried on the hook and the less on the hoof, the better, but within the Community there will be transport of live animals. I am determined that that transport shall be at a standard that is proper and that it reaches the high standards we have in Britain and reaches from the north of Scotland to the south of Sicily.

Dairy Farming

11. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to improve efficiency and profitability in dairy farming.

Mr. Gummer: At last week's Agriculture Council, the United Kingdom opposed further cuts to the milk quota.

Mr. Garnier: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and assume that he will recognise the quality of the grassland in my constituency and the quality of its dairy herds. Will my right hon. Friend promote diversification in agriculture by encouraging the breeding of buffalo and the eating of buffalo meat, which not only tastes good but is low in cholesterol?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend failed to mention the importance of buffalo milk, which is very important in import substitution because of the production of mozzarella cheese. I am very proud of the kind of mozzarella cheese that we can now produce in the United Kingdom and I hope that we shall be able to export it to Italy and elsewhere.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Meale: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Meale: The House will well recall the promises made by the Prime Minister and many of his fellow Ministers before the last general election about the future of the coal mining industry. Now that, today, we are about to hear about the loss of tens of thousands of jobs, will the Prime Minister apologise to those coalfield communities for what the Government are about to do?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will have to curb his impatience for a few moments until my right hon. Friend's statement. He has very little time to wait and then he will be able to judge how right he is or how wrong he is.

Mr. Heald: Has my right hon. Friend seen the 1992 results from Vauxhall Motors today showing huge increase in profits as a result of improved sales, improved market share and a huge increase in exports? Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the work force and all concerned, particularly those living in north Hertfordshire?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I did see those results. They are certainly excellent and I am delighted to congratulate the company on its results, which show what a well-managed company with the right product range can achieve, even in difficult world trading circumstances.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister now understand how foolish he was to claim last October that the closure of 31 pits was—and I quote him directly—"economically unavoidable and better done cleanly and quickly"?

The Prime Minister: As [illegible] right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, we carried out a full review of these matters and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will set out in full detail the outcome of that review shortly. It is the most thorough review of the coal industry that has been undertaken for very many years. It posed many difficult issues which we have been prepared to face. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might also acknowledge the fact that we have supported the industry over the past 14 years to the extent of £18 billion.

Mr. John Smith: The House and the country will have noticed that the Prime Minister does not, indeed cannot, deny that his original intention, as he said himself, was to close all 31 pits immediately. How does he account for that appalling error of judgment?

The Prime Minister: I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is desperately keen to get his usual fix on the early evening news, but he will have to wait for my right hon. Friend's statement.

Mr. John Smith: In the course of the Prime Minister's twisting and turning over the past five months, has he yet begun to appreciate the vital importance of Britain's coal industry to our future energy security? Whatever is or is not in his White Paper, does the Prime Minister now realise that the rigging of the market to secure short-term profits for privatised electricity companies has put at risk the long-term security of energy supplies which should be the cornerstone of any Government's energy policy?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will find it difficult to rewrite his own history. He should remember Labour's record on pit closures. The last Labour Government closed 313 pits and more than 200,000 of the work force lost their jobs. The Labour party cannot live down its past. It backed the National Union of Mineworkers when that union was holding the country to ransom during a year-long strike in the 1980s; it backed demands for unrealistic wages; and it backed demands for overmanning and bad working practices. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not backed those things in the 1980s, many more pits might be open today.

Mr. Thomason: Does my right hon. Friend agree that charge capping and council tax capping are necessary evils to protect the payer from the worst excesses of socialist local government administration? Will he abhor the proposal of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that capping be abolished and that control of local government spending be handed over to the unions?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. The capping of spendthrift local authorities is necessary in order to protect taxpayers. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will cap wherever necessary this year, as in other years. My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) may be keen to know that it is most unlikely that Conservative Basildon this year, unlike Labour Basildon in previous years, will require capping.

Q2. Ms Abbott: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms Abbott: Does the Prime Minister accept that, whatever is in the statement to come, what public opinion outside the House wants is the saving not of 10, 12 or 15 pits but of all 31? It is not out of sentimentality that public opinion demands this. Whatever the short-term interest of the privatised fuel industry, it would be madness, in the long term, for this country to become dependent upon foreign coal and it would be madness to add to the standing army of the long-term unemployed.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady cannot have heard what I said about the Labour Government's record in closing pits. In carrying the review forward, we have had to balance two conflicting factors—our desire to save as many jobs and pits as possible and the hard, cold, real fact that British Coal is producing more coal than its customers want or it can sell. I am confident that my right hon. Friend's review offers the best way forward, both for the coal industry and for the country.

Mr. Cormack: Is my right hon. Friend aware that hon. Members in all parts of the House have watched with admiration President Yeltsin's courageous struggle to bring both economic and political freedom to Russia? Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity today to send the good wishes of the House to President Yeltsin at this very critical time?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to offer my support to President Yeltsin and to express my support for the reform programme. Over the weekend, I sent the President a message precisely about that and I received a reply from him earlier this week. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary plans to visit Moscow next week.

Mr. Ashdown: In the—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. These interruptions take up time.

Mr. Ashdown: In the shadow of last week's atrocity in Warrington, which has claimed yet another life today, was the Prime Minister as moved as I was by the spontaneous and powerful expressions of sympathy and support from the people of Dublin for the people of Warrington, who suffered in that atrocity at the hands of the IRA? Does he agree that people such as Susan McHugh and Gordon Wilson speak for millions when they say that enough is enough? Is it not the case that if the people of Dublin can put the past behind them in their search for peace, the politicians of the whole of Ireland should be able to do the same?

The Prime Minister: The tragedy of another young life lost, sadly, this morning will have touched the hearts of many people in this country and far beyond. The events of last week demonstrate that terrorism brings nothing but agony and misery. But as we condemn terrorism, we must bear it in mind that there are many people in Dublin and elsewhere in the Republic of Ireland, elsewhere in Northern Ireland and Irish citizens in this country, who condemn and detest the terrorists as much as do hon. Members.

Mr. Kynoch: Is my right hon. Friend aware of how much I welcome the further progress that he has made in the Budget to extending the 20p basic rate of tax? Will he make further extensions in the years ahead?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that it is our intention to seek to do that. Our aim is a 20p basic rate of tax. We propose to move towards that as rapidly and prudently as we can by extending the 20p rate.

Q3. Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Ewing: In the continuing context of the Budget, is the Prime Minister aware that changes in the tax regime threaten jobs both offshore and onshore in the oil and gas industries in the north and north-east of Scotland, while the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel represents a threat to the welfare and lives of the elderly and needy in society? Is not it a travesty of justice that the Prime Minister should have introduced a Budget by which, in an energy-rich nation such as Scotland, we gain neither employment nor social benefits?

The Prime Minister: The support that the Government have given the oil industry over many years has brought many tens of thousands of jobs to Scotland, as the hon. Lady knows. There have been changes in the oil regime for offshore drilling in Scotland. That has been welcomed by many of the companies that work there.

Mr. Gale: Knowing him, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will already have sent a message of sympathy to the parents and family of Tim Parry. I hope that he included in that message the good wishes, thoughts and prayers of hon. Members in all parts of the House. Will he find time today to send another message, to the President of the United States, asking him to condemn the people in America who collect money that is paid to the IRA?

The Prime Minister: There is no doubt, as I said, about the feeling in this country—which I know will be shared by President Clinton—over the very sad death of Tim Parry. I know that the American Administration view terrorism in the same way as we do. It is a matter which I have discussed with President Clinton and with his predecessor.

Q4. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Michie: Is the Prime Minister aware that the document "Implementing Caring for People: Assessment," which can only be described as sinister, advises practitioners and local authorities that any unmet need should not be recorded, on the ground, in the explanatory note, that, due to the idea now of freedom of access to information, it would be wrong for that information to be recorded just in case the patients or the clients found out what their rights were?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows that we have done more than any previous Administration to ensure that people are aware of their rights in the social security and health spheres. The new community care arrangements that will exist from 1 April will add to that remarkable record.

Mr. Sumberg: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the disgraceful decision of railway workers to bring this country's transport network to a standstill on 2 April? While he is about it, will he invite the Leader of the Opposition to issue a similar condemnation?

The Prime Minister: I am certainly happy to condemn the suggestion that passengers should be severely inconvenienced by strikes of this kind. I hope that that feeling will be shared by the Leader of the Opposition and many others.

Q5. Mr. Morley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Morley: Will the Prime Minister confirm that under his Government total taxation for most people is far higher than it was under previous Labour Governments? What advice will he give to constituents such as mine, Mr. and Mrs. Cook, who have worked all their lives for a little bit of works pension which is 36p a week above any kind of benefit level? What kind of assistance will they get with the crippling increase in gas and electricity charges when value added tax is applied?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman was really concerned about the tax burden, which allegedly he is said to be, perhaps he would withdraw his support from all the spending increases that Opposition Members propose week after week after week.

Coal Industry

3.30 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the conclusions of the Government's coal review. I must ask the indulgence of the House for what will be a lengthy statement. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be making arrangements for a debate early next week.

The House will recall that this wide-ranging review was to look at the prospects for the 21 pits proposed for closure by British Coal last October in the context of the Government's energy policy.

First, I should like to pay tribute to the Trade and Industry Select Committee for the detailed work in its report.

I have a number of important new announcements to make about future opportunities for the British coal industry. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the generators and the regional electricity companies have now formally confirmed their intention to enter into base contracts and the necessary back-to-back contracts which will enable British Coal to supply 160 million tonnes of coal over five years, with 40 million tonnes in the first year and 30 million tonnes in each of the next four years.

The Select Committee identified the central issue—that it is only sensible to produce coal for which there is a market. The key question then becomes how big that market is. There is inevitably great difficulty in predicting the size of a long-term market as complex as the one for coal. The dominant market is in the England and Wales electricity supply industry. Estimates of the size of this market vary widely and a number of different fuels compete for it.

It is central to the Government's energy policy to help create competitive energy markets within which consumers can obtain electricity produced from a diversity of sources at competitive prices. This is the best way to keep consumers' costs down and thereby strengthen our industrial competitiveness. Let me comment therefore on the fuel sources that compete with British Coal: gas, oil, nuclear, orimulsion, coal from various sources and electricity supplied through the interconnector with France.

I agree with the Select Committee that it would be wrong not to take advantage of the massive public investment in nuclear power. Electricity produced from existing nuclear stations has the lowest marginal cost. The benefits should not be denied to British industry and other consumers. We will, however, wish to look closely at any requests from Nuclear Electric for approval for capital investment in relation to proposals for extending the life of any Magnox stations. We will also be bringing forward our review of the future prospects for nuclear power.

Let me deal next with gas. It has been suggested that I should withhold further planning consents for gas-fired power stations. In considering this, I must have regard to my statutory powers and responsibilities. I do not intend to interfere with existing power station consents, or to alter my policy in taking future consent decisions under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989. Consequently, matters such as the need for a generating station, its capacity, choice of fuel and type of plant remain commercial matters for applicants.

The House will appreciate that, whatever decisions I might take on new section 36 consents, they could not be relevant to the market for coal for at least another three years, since it would take at least that long for any new station to be brought into operation. In this context, I have decided that the Connah's Quay development in north Wales should be allowed to proceed. This is a sour gas project of a kind that the Select Committee favoured. I am also today granting consent to two smaller projects, one using sour gas at Ryedale in North Yorkshire and a combined heat and power scheme at Aylesford in Kent. Together, the three projects will involve investment of over £2 billion and will lead to the creation of over 5,000 construction jobs, as well as several thousand in related industries.

I have considered carefully the position of orimulsion. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 16 March, orimulsion, like other oil substitutes, will be subject to hydrocarbon oil duty. As such, it will bear duty at the same rate as heavy fuel oil. It will also be subject to the normal environmental controls for which Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is responsible. There are existing binding contracts for the import of orimulsion into the United Kingdom, with which the Government have no powers to interfere. The Government have, however, been informed that orimulsion imports to the United Kingdom are likely to be reduced by at least 500,000 tonnes equivalent of coal a year from current levels and to remain at the minimum contractual level for the foreseeable future.

In one area I have been driven to a different conclusion from that reached by the Select Committee. It recommended that I should remove Electricité de France's non-leviable status and ensure that British-produced electricity should gain access to the French electricity market and to third markets through France. I have considered this carefully and I published on 18 March a summary of the legal advice that I had received. The position is clear. Any governmental measure to prevent or restrict imports of electricity across the interconnector with France would run counter to article 30 of the treaty of Rome. Further, the Government would be at financial risk under the indemnity given to the National Grid Company at the time of electricity privatisation and reported to this House.

Electricité de France's electricity's non-leviable status could not be removed without giving EdF the benefit of levy payments. In other words, EdF could have to be given the same premium for its electricity as is now given to Nuclear Electric and financed by the levy. Far from reducing imports from France, this would reinforce their position, and our consumers would end up paying more for their electricity.

I have to tell the House that I see no prospect of reducing the net amount of electricity coming across the interconnector to zero, as indicated by the Select Committee. However, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and I have explored the scope for sales of electricity to France across the interconnector. The Minister has had talks with his French counterpart and the indications for sales in later years are good. Confirmation of this came in the announcement earlier this week of an eight-year export contract representing potential sales in excess of £100 million from the United Kingdom to France. The House will also wish to note that the latest forecast shows that sales by EdF in the United Kingdom are likely to decline progressively and significantly.

I must now address that section of the market which is supplied by deep-mined, opencast and imported coal. The base contracts that I have just announced secure 160 million tonnes over five years at a value of £5·5 billion. This leaves British Coal as one of the world's largest coal producers. Opencast coal is a significant generator of employment providing jobs, whether directly or indirectly, for some 17,000 people throughout the United Kingdom. It is an economic source of energy which needs no subsidy from consumers or taxpayers. It can also play an important role in reclamation and redevelopment of derelict land.

While the Government do not think it would be right to impose arbitrary limits, British Coal has indicated in its evidence to the coal review that it expects its opencast output to fall over the next five years from the current level of 16 million tonnes to 12 million tonnes. British Coal's latest expectation is that opencast output will be lower still.

I welcome the increased scope for deep-mined coal which this represents. It will not affect British Coal's current contracts with companies that operate their opencast sites; nor will it affect the private sector opencast producers licensed by British Coal. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is currently reviewing the guidance to planning authorities on opencast coal. He will be announcing today how we will be carrying this forward in the light of the White Paper.

British Coal's prospects of winning and holding a share of the wider market for coal depend on increased competitiveness. There is a critical role here for the private sector. We believe that privatisation is the only way of enabling this industry to take full advantage of the opportunities that the market offers. British Coal will therefore begin immediately to prepare for full privatisation. It has confirmed that, in advance of full privatisation, any pits which the corporation does not itself wish to keep in operation will be offered to the private sector. The Government will be making available up to £1 million to assist in funding consultancy studies for management and employee buy-outs.

To provide a further impetus for this, I intend to appoint a board member who will have special executive responsibility for privatisation. This will be supported by a new unit within my Department. The Government will consider legislation to remove the manpower limit for private mines if this proves necessary.

The Government have looked carefully at the position of large electricity users. I am working with the Director General of Electricity Supply to examine the circumstances under which they might bypass the pool. I will also embark shortly on further consultations with the director general, the electricity industry and large users on whether demand-side bidding would improve the workings of the electricity market. In addition, the Government are reviewing the current regulation of on-site generation, which could offer large users an alternative source of electricity.

I turn now to the most important of the Select Committee's recommendations. I have authorised British Coal to negotiate for future contracts on the basis that it would supply at a world market-related price. The Government are prepared to subsidise the difference between this price and British Coal's cost of production. This subsidy will apply for any additional tonnages that British Coal is able to sell to the generators, whether or not these are on long-term contracts. The subsidy will reduce progressively over the period to full privatisation. The amount of subsidy will depend on the outcome of commercial negotiation, but we are prepared to embrace the range of figures put forward by the Select Committee. These arrangements will be notified to the European Commission under the relevant state aids provisions.

Private sector mines will also be able to seek Government financial backing for supplementary sales at world-related prices on the same basis as British Coal and consistent with the relevant EC provisions, provided that they can demonstrate that this was for genuinely additional tonnages.

I cannot guarantee that supplementary sales will be achieved by British Coal, but both generators have said that they will continue negotiations for such sales. To the extent that these sales fall short of the level envisaged by the Select Committee, expenditure will of course be less than that which they estimated.

I am also aware that coal stocks are at very high levels. There are 33 million tonnes with the generators and a further 12 million tonnes at the pithead. Some reduction in coal output is therefore essential.

As the House would expect, we have kept British Coal closely in touch with our thinking and we have provided it with an advance copy of the White Paper. Having considered this, British Coal has announced today that it is to consult on closure proposals for two of the 21 pits under review—Bolsover and Sharlston—whose reserves will shortly exhaust. Any redundancies will be subject to statutory consultation and notification requirements.

British Coal has also announced that, again subject to consultations, it proposes to place the following six pits on a care-and-maintenance basis—Bevercotes, Clipstone, Easington, Rossington, Shirebrook and Westoe. These six pits and the two proposed for closure in the coming months will be made available to the private sector.

Twelve of the 13 remaining pits will continue to produce while British Coal, with Government financial backing, looks for additional sales at world-related prices. British Coal is proposing that, again subject to consultations, one further pit—Maltby—will be placed on development. This will help to ensure that its reserves are available into the next century. The future of coaling in individual pits will depend on the extent to which intensive efforts over the coming months identify a market for their product or realistic prospect of sale to the private sector.

Safety must continue to be paramount. The Government are determined to ensure, in consultation with the Health and Safety Commission, that the existing high safety standards in such mines are maintained after they pass into the private sector.

I have a general responsibility for competition, which of course includes the electricity market. Both I and the Director General of Electricity Supply have a statutory duty to exercise our functions under the Electricity Act 1989 to promote competition. The director general has the full support of my Department in rigorously policing the competitive electricity market.

I have taken the opportunity of the review to consider a number of long-term issues about the future of the industry. Clean coal technology will be vital to ensuring that coal continues to play a long-term role in the energy industries. The Government intend to make available an additional £12 million over the next three years to secure the future of the Coal Research Establishment before its transition to the private sector. The Government also intend to encourage links with international research programmes.

The Government intend to publish an annual energy report to provide information relevant to business and investment decisions. In keeping with a recommendation of the Select Committee, the Government, in preparing the report, will be advised by a new energy advisory panel of independent experts.

The Government are acutely aware of the impact that any mining closures have on miners, their families and their communities. We announced a substantial package of measures in October to help areas that might be affected by closures. The Government have decided to increase the amount available to £200 million. The additonal funds will allow major new projects to go ahead. These include a flagship business park in the Nottingham area and advance factory provision in several areas. The regeneration measures are to be co-ordinated by Lord Walker.

I can also announce our intention that the headquarters of the new coal authority proposed under our privatisation measures will be located in Nottinghamshire. In addition, my Department will support the establishment of a new regional development organisation based in Nottingham to attract inward investment to the east midlands.

Finally, let me remind the House of what I said earlier. There can be no guarantees. The market for coal is complex and unpredictable. Even among the experts, opinions differ. I have done all that I reasonably could, consistent with economic realities and legal constraints, to increase the opportunities for British Coal.

It is now for British Coal to make the most of these opportunities. The outcome will be settled, as it should be, in the marketplace. Our policies will give the industry every chance of strengthening its position and achieving future success. It is now up to the people who work in the industry to build on this.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): The House has just heard a comprehensive admission of failure. There was little in what the President of the Board of Trade said to the House that he could not have said on 13 October and there was much in the statement that he did say on 13 October.

The right hon. Gentleman promised that he would look for new markets for coal. He has just admitted that he has failed to find a market for one single extra tonne of coal. The contracts, which the right hon. Gentleman was pleased to announce to the House today, are precisely the same tonnage as the contracts on 13 October which forced the closure of 31 pits. How can the right hon. Gentleman claim to have saved 12 pits when he has not sold a single additional tonne of coal?

Will the right hon. Gentleman concede that his negotiating skills have delivered a bargain in which he has provided a subsidy on coal to the generators without getting them to agree to one extra tonne of coal? Does he really believe that a two-year subsidy will change anything? That is not a rescue plan; it is only a stay of execution.

Why does not the right hon. Gentleman admit that the period of two years has nothing to do with the time to turn round those pits and everything to do with his timetable to privatise the coal industry and wash his hands of it? The right hon. Gentleman complained that coal is a complex market in the electricity system. He should know: the Government created that complex market. They created a rigged market which is denying coal a fair chance to compete.

Why did the statement do nothing to cool the dash for gas which is closing the coal mines? Why does not the right hon. Gentleman challenge the sweetheart deals between the electricity companies and the new gas-fired power stations which guarantee them sales, not for two years, but for 15 years? Is not the conclusion from the statement that the only thing that the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to do about the dash for gas is to license three more contracts for new gas-fired power stations?

Why does the statement—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about jobs?"] What about jobs? Conservative Members should consider the 30,000 miners' jobs, the 20,000 people who work in factories, the 10,000 people who shift coal on the railways and the 100,000 who will be made unemployed as a result of the statement.

Why does the statement do nothing to check imports of electricity from France—electricity which is more expensive than electricity produced from British Coal? Does the right hon. Gentleman or any Conservative Member imagine that the French Government would import electricity from us if they had to close French pits to do that? Why do we continue to accept that Community rules oblige us to import electricity from France when we cannot get the French to agree to carry our electricity to Spain?

Why does the statement do nothing to create a level playing field for competition between coal and nuclear electricity? Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that, if coal received subsidy as large as that received by Nuclear Electric, it could deliver half its coal to the power stations for free? What kind of competition is that?

Why does the White Paper do nothing to provide stability for coal sales by postponing next year's cut in the guaranteed market to the power generators? Is that why PowerGen withdrew its offer of 4 February to take an extra 55 million tonnes over five years? Why is it that, the longer the review has continued, the less the right hon. Gentleman has been able to deliver?

Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that we are about to hear in the business statement that the House will be expected to debate a White Paper on Monday which has only just been placed in the Vote Office? Is not the reason for that panic timetable the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is afraid that, the longer the public consider the White Paper, the more they will see through it? The right hon. Gentleman has taken five months to write a White Paper which he dare not allow the House five days to analyse.

Britain's pits have doubled productivity in eight years. They are modern and efficient pits which have cut the price of coal by one sixth in the past five years. What a contrast that is with a Government who have just put up fuel bills by one sixth by slapping VAT on them.

The White Paper does not save a single pit beyond two years; it does not save electricity consumers from paying, through their bills, the extra costs of constructing new gas-powered stations; it does not save the balance of trade from the extra costs of importing coal and gas; it does not save public spending from the cost of closing pits which it would be cheaper to keep open; and it will not save the right hon. Gentleman's reputation.

This mix of short-term subsidy and long-term betrayal may be enough to buy off the rebels on the Government Benches, but it will not buy off the nation, who will not forgive the Government for abandoning Europe's richest coal reserves.

Mr. Heseltine: I think that the whole House will have noted the central accusation of the hon. Member for Livingstone (Mr. Cook) that this was an admission of failure. It is, if I may say so, characteristic that when I have committed hundreds of millions of pounds of taxpayers' support and agreed with the Select Committee report in substance, the hon. Gentleman should think that is a question of failure.

The fact of the matter is that an all-party Select Committee with a majority of Labour members [Interruption.]—a majority of Conservative members and a Labour Chairman—indicated the way forward and I have broadly accepted the thrust of its central recommendation. That is not failure; that is listening to the House of Commons and responding to it.

It is characteristic that, whenever the Government provide an opportunity for British industry to win, the first thing the hon. Gentleman does is to run down the prospects of success. It is quite apparent that he has missed the central point about the nature of the market which the Select Committee and I have identified. What he has done is to fall back on the old arguments about a rigged market.

Why did I not suppress the demand for gas? First, because it is efficient; secondly, because the market has demanded it should be there; thirdly, because a large number of jobs are dependent on it; and, fourthly, because I agree with the Select Committee that we should not do it.

Let us consider the easiest response to the hon. Gentleman. "Why did you not deal with the French?", he said. In the House, on 3 August 1978, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), when Secretary of State for Energy—[Interruption.]—had this to say:

"I am informing the Central Electricity Generating Board that it has my approval in principle for investment in the proposed 2,000 mw cross-Channel electricity cable to be constructed and operated jointly with Electricité de France . . . The expected cost to the CEGB is £131 million. The link is planned to come into operation in stages, the first 1,000 mw in 1982 and the second in 1983."—[Official Report, 3 August 1978; Vol. 955, c. 545-6.]

The problem is that, when he gave permission in principle to the CEGB, he had not wrapped up the details of the contract.

I do not think that we want to preoccupy ourselves only with the unreconstituted left. The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy all through the time when this was going on. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield might say that he was only a little fish. The Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), however, was Minister for Trade.

Hon. Members: Resign.

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. A great many hon. Members want—and are expecting—to put questions. Therefore, time should not be wasted with a lot of noise.

Mr. Heseltine: It was not rigging the market; it was selling out the market. That is what the Labour Government did.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Shame on you.

Mr. Heseltine: No, shame on the party that did it.

The next phoney accusation of selling out is the nuclear allegation that the hon. Member for Livingston paraded before the House. Once again, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, on behalf of the Government of which he was a Member, explaining what he felt to be the future for nuclear provision, said:

"If we look ahead at the mix of fuels which we think we shall need in this country in the year 2000, it is not possible to abstract the nuclear component without running a serious risk which no energy Minister could recommend to this House. —[Official Report, 15 May 1978; Vol. 950, c.174.]

That is the argument that has to be presented. I join the right hon. Gentleman, for the first and perhaps the only time in my life, in presenting that argument to the House.

The right hon. Gentleman gave the figure. On 25 January 1978, he told the House——

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the entire House, including Ministers, that we are not into debate. Debate comes on Monday. [Interruption.] Order. I am on my feet. Hon. Members are expecting to be called, so they should keep quiet now and they might then be called. I seek brisk questions—[Interruption.] Order. Allow me to finish. Equally, I seek brisk responses to those questions so that we might make some progress this afternoon.

Mr. Heseltine: I fully understand your ruling, Madam Speaker. I was merely trying to respond to the inquiries from the hon. Member for Livingston. Let me help you, Madam Speaker. I believe that we have shown British Coal the way forward. We have offered it a chance. We have recognised what the Select Committee said and I commend the White Paper to the House.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): Does my right hon. Friend accept that Conservative Members appreciate his statement this afternoon and would like to compliment him on his hard work and diligence in coming up with a statement that will be so helpful to the British coal industry? Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in recent years, British Coal has been saying that, by 1995, it will be able to produce and sell coal at world market prices if it is given the opportunity to have assistance through to 1995? Does my right hon. Friend agree that his statement this afternoon gives British Coal not only that very opportunity but the opportunity to have a long and viable future?

Mr. Heseltine: I say at once to my hon. Friend and to his colleagues on the Select Committee on Trade and Industry that I have listened as carefully as possible. It has been an extremely constructive dialogue and I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend, who has particular knowledge and expertise. I and the Government are trying to give British Coal and, as soon as it can be arranged, the private sector the opportunity to seek markets with a competitive price for their product. We are all well aware that the more we have privatised the former nationalised industries, the more they have gone out into the world and won for Britain.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Secretary of State accept that we welcome the fact that he has listened to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry? However, he should not anticipate that he has the Committee's whole-hearted support, because he has not been able to accept the recommendations in full or to an extent that would have saved more of the pits. I welcome his assurances on gas, but does he acknowledge that it is unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not consider the confidence of the North sea oil and gas industry when he introduced the tax change in the Budget? There could have been a more helpful combination.

The energy industry is in its present state precisely because of the Government's privatisation of gas and of electricity, which was carried out in ways that failed to create a genuinely competitive market. Is not that why Sir James McKinnon now demands the break-up of British Gas? Is not it high time that the Secretary of State reorganised the electricity industry to make the market work? Will he, therefore, accept that the only consistency of Government energy policy is not to have had a policy for the past 13 years? Is not that a denial of the White Paper, which he claimed was to be a comprehensive energy review? There is no mention of an energy review, but just a discussion of a market for coal. This is a short-term fix, which does not meet the long-term needs of the nation.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman must have failed to hear what I said. I said that there would be an independent group of energy experts and that there would be an annual energy report. Those ideas were included after consultation with my colleagues, as a result of the Select Committee's proposals.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's views about the North sea. When a tax regime is changed, some win and some lose. Many companies in the North sea can look forward to an improved position from the lower levels of petroleum revenue tax which have been announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Gentleman would not expect me to be drawn on the issue of British Gas because it is the subject of a Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I recognise the work undertaken by him, by the Minister for Energy and by many in his Department to produce the White Paper? However, will he assure the House today that the White Paper provides an extra and further market for coal? If it does, what will be the immediate effect?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has taken an acute interest in the matter and I have been especially grateful to her for her advice on the ways in which we should make speedy progress towards privatisation. What both the Select Committee in its report and the Government in the White Paper have emphasised is that we are dealing with the marketplace. One can analyse and make predictions about the marketplace, but in the end one is dependent on customers. British Coal must now, with the advantage that we have given it of being able to compete at world market prices, secure that market. We shall give British Coal every help in doing that.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central): Did not the Select Committee make it clear that its recommendations should be taken as a comprehensive whole? It is therefore wrong for the Secretary of State to pick the bits that suit his case and then to claim to support the report. Is he aware that his statement today is an economic disaster for Doncaster? He talks about the marketplace. I am concerned about the job marketplace in Doncaster through which the right hon. Gentleman has driven a big hole today. He spoke in October about the support that would be given to areas affected, yet we have seen none of that yet in my area. When will we get that support? What does he intend to do about the disaster that he has created for my constituency?

Mr. Heseltine: I think that I can help the right hon. Gentleman. I am very concerned to ensure that where closures take place, there is the help that I have announced. It is self-evident to those who understand these matters that no one is allowed to prejudge consultative procedures that are under way. Until British Coal comes to a conclusion, through the consultative processes, about the way forward, we do not know exactly what closures will take place. It is therefore not possible to anticipate and to start spending money.

The House will understand that one of the great advantages of Select Committees, which I strongly supported when they were extended in 1979-80, is that they can range over a subject and put forward many different proposals. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry has done a commendable job. However, nobody believes that a Select Committee is a substitute for Government. We have to study the Select Committees' proposals and we have to take the decisions. There are often lonely questions about the allocation of priorities. I hope that, on reflection, the Select Committee will feel that its work has been taken extremely seriously.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his statement proves that the Government are determined to do all that they can to help the British coal industry—whether it is in the private sector or the public sector—to become competitive so that it can supply coal to the market at the price that the market demands? Will he ensure that the subsidies are prudently spent, because they come from taxes paid by other successful businesses throughout the country? It is very important that they are spent carefully.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He addresses the central issue that faced me last October and has faced my colleagues ever since. If my announcement leads to extra contracts, it will cost the taxpayer hundreds of millions of pounds. We will therefore ensure that the negotiations that lead to such potential are carefully and rigorously conducted and that they are of a tapering nature to ensure that British Coal continues to have the incentive to improve productivity.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Will the President of the Board of Trade, through the usual channels, allow a debate on Monday not just on the White Paper but on the 39 recommendations made in the Select Committee report to give the House the right to make decisions on them? I am concerned that, after six months of delay by the Government—the President of the Board of Trade knows that the Select Committee report was published on 29 January—we are now to be forced to debate a serious issue in an unacceptable time span of about 48 hours. I ask the usual channels to allow a little more time not only for the House to reflect on the issue, but—[Interruption.] As the President of the Board of Trade has raised the subject of the Select Committee report, and if it is not too much for Conservative Members to listen, the Chairman of the Select Committee has the right at least to put down one or two markers.

May serious consideration be given to the report to allow the nation time to reflect on the content of the 152-page White Paper, which will be debated on Monday? My quick analysis—and it has been quick—of the main provisions of the White Paper suggests that all 31 pits will be closed in the next three or four years. That will cost the British taxpayer about £2 billion. Eighteen of those pits and 18,000 jobs will be lost this year alone. This package is merely a change of tactics—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ask a question".] I want to deal with the points that the President made——

Madam Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman heard me earlier when I reminded the House that hon. Members should not ask questions. A debate will be held on Monday. We want to hear the hon. Gentleman put his question to the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. Cabom: I will ask the President of the Board of Trade specific questions. Why has he, again, failed to question whether there is a larger market for coal—the very question he posed to the House on 21 October? Why has he chosen price support for British Coal in the full knowledge that his proposals do not provide the market beyond the 40 million tonnes this year and 30 million tonnes in the subsequent four years? Why has he not answered the Select Committee report, which addressed the question whether there is a larger market for coal? Will he now answer questions on the licensing of gas, on the baseload of gas, on the letter that I wrote to him about EDF and on opencast mining by British Coal and the private sector? Why has he chosen not to comment on the franchising of the regional electricity companies—which is mentioned in the report that he has ignored—which would make a further market for 20 million tonnes? The right hon. Gentleman has ducked those questions this afternoon, but he should answer them.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman, who, as the House knows, is Chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, misunderstands the nature of what I have said today. While it is entirely for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to determine the subject of the debate, within my White Paper there is reference to every recommendation of the Select Committee and a Government response to it. It would be difficult for us to debate the issue without referring to the Select Committee report. We are under pressure to make progress on the matter because the contracts for British Coal run out on 31 March, so there is great uncertainty in the industry and it is important that the House has an opportunity to debate the matters.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the central issue, to which I have referred many times already—the market-place. As I understand it, the view of the Select Committee about the market place is that we should do certain things to expand it, some of which I have been able to do in part. Secondly, it recommended that we should provide a subsidy to enable British Coal to obtain part of the additional market space. I have accepted that recommendation. It named certain rates of subsidy that might be necessary and I have already said that I am prepared to embrace figures broadly in line with those of the Select Committee.

The only issue is whether I could have been expected, by now, to have seen British Coal sign up the additional contracts. The Select Committee never told me to come back to the House with signed contracts. It told me to allow British Coal to go out and negotiate for contracts. That is what I have announced that I shall do.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I congratulate the President of the Board of Trade on maintaining a competitive energy industry and on his recognition of the fact that it is no good curing unemployment in one industry only to create it in another. Will he keep a watchful eye on coal stocks which, at 45 million tonnes, are excessive, so as to ensure that they do not deteriorate and go to waste?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend touches on another central dilemma in the debate. It is that it is often a question not of protecting jobs in general but of protecting jobs in one industry or another. The more that one chokes off the market to enable coal to fill it, the more one destroys jobs and confidence in a range of alternative industries, many of which are doing extremely well. The House will have recognised that I have today announced the go-ahead for a project with which 5,000 jobs are associated. It is very much a question of priorities, but British Coal now has a chance to compete in the market place with a product that is priced competitively.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Minister aware that what he has done today is to confirm unemployment for between 80,000 to 100,000 people and condemned to death the communities whose pits will close at a time of mass unemployment and that, for those people, his statement will have been the most cynical, arrogant and inaccurate that has been heard in the House for many years? That is so not least because the aim of the interconnector with France was to export British coal to France. As he knows, that is the purpose. The Labour Government launched the Selby coalfield and authorised the Drax B coal-fired station.

The most dishonest thing of all is that the money that was supposed to be given to help the areas has been diverted to subsidise the pits for privatisation. When private owners buy pits, they will find them already subsidised. If the Minister is interested in history, will he look back and find that, when the pits were last privately owned, in the 1930s, 1,100,000 miners were injured and 7,800 killed?

The amount of money made available, allegedly to help that group of people whose livelihood is ended, contrasts with the £10 billion made by market forces when the currency collapsed last September. The Minister has made an utterly unacceptable statement and, apart from the cheering crowds behind him, nobody in the country will believe that he has done anything but confirm the betrayal of his earlier statement.

Mr. Heseltine: When the right hon. Member stands before the House and says that really what the EdF deal was about was exporting to France—he nods his head—I can only ask the House who is misleading whom. I will quote from Hansard. The right hon. Member, when he was in power, said:

"The link will add to the security and diversity of the CEGB's sources of electricity".—[Official Report, 3 August 1978; Vol. 955, c. 546.]

Who, I ask again, is misleading whom?

Sir Cranley Onslow (Woking): I assure my right hon. Friend that, just because an hon. Member happens to be Chairman of a Select Committee, that does not mean that he owns the Committee or speaks for it. As a member of the Select Committee, I can assure him that some of the criticisms which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) has levelled at him are not shared by the majority of the members of the Committee. We are very willing indeed that this matter should be debated as soon as possible so that we have an opportunity to emphasise what really matters. British Coal must save itself by its exertions and my right hon. Friend has given it the opportunity, with privatised industry, to do just that.

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend has been immensely helpful to me in advising me on many matters in this connection. I believe that the views that he has expressed represent the views that anyone reading the Select Committee report would form. I very much welcome the fact that the Select Committee said as clearly as it did—and, in the report it published, as fairly as it did —what the reality of the opportunities was.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): May I ask the President of the Board of Trade what I should say to my constituents who work at Maltby colliery, the most modern deep mine single complex in Europe, which has just had £190 million spent on it, now that it has been announced this afternoon that the work force is to be sacked?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member should tell his work force that we intend to put the pit into a development phase in which £30 million of taxpayers' money will be invested in order to carry on the life of that pit into the next century. If the hon. Member would look to the positive opportunities and stop trying to undermine every opportunity created, his constituents would be better off.

Mr. Winston Churchill (Davyhulme): I thank my right hon. Friend for the very considerable distance that he has travelled since 13 October last year. Can confirm that the purpose of providing a short-term subsidy to these 13 pits is to put them in a position to carry forward into the future once they have reached world market prices, and that he and the Government will use their best endeavours to help carve out a wider market for coal? Specifically, can he undertake that the Government, once there is a new French Government in place in Paris, will conduct political discussions at the highest level in order to arrive at a situation in which there is a more neutral flow across the interconnector and for exploring the prospects for exports to third countries?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has taken a particular interest in this matter and I am most grateful to him for what he has now said. Within the legal constraints which I have explained to the House and on which I have taken advice, we are in discussion with the French Government. This is not, perhaps, the best moment in history at which to pursue these discussions, but I certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance for which he asks: they will be continued. We have seen some welcome developments since these discussions got under way and my hon. Friend has played a conspicuous part in that.

On the central issue which my hon. Friend put to me, we are trying to give British Coal the opportunity to seek out these additional markets, partly because we have been able to show where some of those markets will be and partly because the generators are now saying that they wish to negotiate supplemental contracts over and above the base contracts which have been concluded effectively today. So the only lasting position for their future is to seize that opportunity at a moment when there is a drive to competitive positions.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does the President of the Board of Trade realise that his statement today does nothing for the long-term energy future of this country? Nor, indeed, does it do anything to save Parkside, the last pit in the north-west that is viable and has long-term reserves. What has happened to the right hon. Gentleman's promise to intervene? Does he no longer eat breakfast, lunch and dinner? Does he not realise that his reputation and career are in tatters?

Mr. Heseltine: The pit to which the hon. Gentleman refers is one of the 10. He will know that it is now subject to consultation and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on it. If British Coal is determined to proceed to closure, there will be an opportunity for the private sector to make arrangements to take it over.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): While everybody regrets the loss of any jobs, particularly in the mining industry, is not the truth that no Government of either party has been able to guarantee jobs in the mining industry, an industry which as recently as 1955 employed no fewer than 750,000 people, and that the only guarantee comes from the level of the market?

Does my right hon. Friend accept that his statement will be seen as a genuine and thorough attempt to give the coal industry the best chance for the future without undermining the competitive position of the rest of British industry? Will he also give an assurance that the energy market, the review of the Magnox stations and new investment will be looked at fairly, on their merits?

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend knows a great deal about this market and I can readily give him the assurance that he has sought. I am grateful to him for the way in which he has described the work that we have tried to do. This is about an opportunity, but I think that British Coal is only too anxious to respond to that opportunity. Some of the recent productivity gains that have been achieved will help them on their way.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that he has just delivered a confidence trick that would have done Paul Daniels proud? This is set against a background of more than 4 million people out of work, so I plead with the Government not to weep crocodile tears today about unemployed people. More than 50,000 people will lose their jobs in the mining industry and elsewhere as a result of this statement. The Minister said that his hands were tied, but if he had taken the import levels back to 1979 and the opencast levels back to 1979—he always quotes that year—and if he had stopped orimulsion, he would have saved 25 pits. If he got rid of the Magnox nuclear reactors he would save another five pits and if he had had the guts to say to the French that we were not going to have their electricity sold here in Britain, just as the French are saying that they will not buy our fish, we could have saved another six pits and thus saved all 31.

The truth is that we are faced with a gutless and spineless Government who should be got rid of as soon as possible.

Mr. Heseltine: The real question for the hon. Member is, what was he doing before 1979 pursuing policies, the logic of which we are discussing today?

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware, that since this review began, not one new exploration platform has been authorised for the North sea and not one new platform has been commenced at any yard in the north-east of England? While all of us in the north of England want to save the coal industry in our part of the country, by any means that we can, we also realise that the benefits of the future rest on the North sea and the riches that it possesses, and we look forward from today's statement for a further development there in the very near future.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend comes to the heart of the matter. The announcement I made today about Connah's Quay is very important to British industry. Creating jobs there might have a very attractive long-term potential, for work not only in the North sea but in the international exploration industry.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Why did the President of the Board of Trade studiously ignore, in his statement, the unanimous report of the Select Committee on Employment on the employment consequences of the pit closures? Could it be because it was the unanimous view of all the members of the Committee, whatever their political views, that both the true national costs and the social effects of pit closures should have been, and were not, taken into account and that no pit should be closed, unless and until there has been full consultation and complete consideration of all the factors in that unanimous report, and every effort had been made to safeguard not only the miners concerned, but the other affected workers, of whom there are twice as many?

Why did not the Government permit their response to the report to be made available to members of the Committee until after the President had sat down, when the report was placed in the Library? Could it be because the Government's response to the unanimous report included this disgraceful sentence:

"The Government considers that the estimation of the financial costs of unemployment referred to in the Select Committee's conclusions would not be meaningful"?

Surely it is meaningful that there are national costs, personal costs, social costs and misery in the devastating effect referred to in this unanimous report on all the pit closures. Will the President please consult the Employment Secretary and come back with a worthy reply that will help the people whose lives will be wrecked by his statement?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. and learned Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has replied to the Select Committee's report —an entirely proper course. Let me take one central issue. When jobs are created, very few people go round multiplying the number by three to indicate the number of potential jobs in the economy. However, when jobs are destroyed, people immediately multiply the number by three in order to show the harm that is being done. In my view, in both cases people are likely to be far short of the real world.

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the new hopes and the new opportunities that his statement gives to British Coal as a whole will be even more advantageous to the low-cost, high-productivity, Conservative-financed pits, such as the Selby complex? Does he recognise that he may even have underestimated the scope for exporting British coal to Europe, particularly from pits like Selby, where the cost of production is already at the low world-cost level?

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend has a deep interest in the matter. I am very well aware of the excellence of the Selby pit. British Coal is now beginning to achieve remarkable advances in productivity. The sad reflection —indeed, the tragedy that lies behind this entire debate —is that, if there had been such achievements years ago, we should be having a very different sort of debate today.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): What we have had from the President of the Board of Trade today indicates that he has no knowledge of the mining industry. The fact that he has named Sharlston colliery—my colliery—for early closure amounts to a stab in the back for 700 men who work at that pit. Will the President of the Board of Trade explain to those men why, with the fuel fossil levy that all of us pay through our electricity bills, which will be 10 per cent. of the total account from next April, they cannot have a share of that levy to help save the pit? The reserves are there. What we need is investment and a visit to Sharlston by the President of the Board of Trade to hear what the men have to say about his decision to close their pit early.

Will he also explain why, in an area where there is to be early closure of pits, assisted area status is not being afforded to the local authority? What we are witnessing is a stab in the back from the President of the Board of Trade for miners in general, but for Sharlston in particular.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member will be fully aware that decisions about moving a pit to closure are a matter for the board of British Coal. It is a little unwise of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that the members of that board do not bring a very great degree of expertise to such matters. It would not be appropriate for me now to comment on the individual pits that are the subject of this announcement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Because they have to move to statutory consultation procedures. That is a matter for British Coal to continue, which is what it will do.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, despite the decision to locate the headquarters of the energy commission in Nottinghamshire, the pit closure programme that he has announced today will cause devastation in north Nottinghamshire, particularly at Bevercotes, where I have 500 constituents who will be out of work immediately? Does he recollect giving an undertaking to the president and secretary of the UDM that he would do everything that he could to keep UDM pits open? [Interruption.] How does he square that with the fact that, at the end of the day, only three of the formerly seven UDM pits will remain open?

Mr. Heseltine: I am aware of the acute interest that my hon. Friend has in today's announcement. It is not possible for me or British Coal to distinguish between pits on the basis of which unions happen to represent them. We are acutely aware of the remarkable contribution that the UDM made towards the advances of the industry in the early 1980s. While that is true, it is not a factor that can enter into the consultative procedures.

My hon. Friend said that there would be an immediate change and people would lose their jobs. That is not the case. The procedure is that the pit moves into a closure consultation procedure, not for closure, but for a regime of care and maintenance, so that, if the market should prove to be even larger than we are talking of in respect of those that remain open, there is the possibility of reactivating the pits.

But should Bevercotes move through the consultation procedures and as a result British Coal decides that it should close, at that stage there would still be the opportunity for the private sector to make an offer to take it over.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, if Taff Merthyr colliery closes, it will be the end of one of the greatest and proudest traditions, the end of mining in the Merthyr valley, even though that valley has more than 20 per cent. of men out of work and another 20 per cent. economically inactive? We passionately believe that we have economic reserves that could go to a power station no more than 15 miles down the road by direct rail line. Will the so-called consultation procedures now allow us to put before an independent review body the case that we want to make for Taff Merthyr colliery?

Mr. Heseltine: My reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) is relevant to the questions that the hon. Gentleman is asking. If British Coal determines that the pit should close, it will be available for sale to the private sector. It is already in the consultative process and it would not be right for me to interfere in that process. Anyone who knows south Wales as well as the hon. Gentleman does—and I have some knowledge of the area—knows that there has been a dramatic rundown in the coal mining industry in recent years, a wide diversification of the Welsh economy and a substantial improvement in prosperity as a result.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmoreland and Lonsdale): Is my right hon. Friend aware that few fair-minded people will wish to argue that he and the Select Committee have not worked extremely hard to find as good a future for the coal industry as is reasonable? How much will the package that he announced today cost the taxpayer? He said that it could cost several hundred million pounds. I am sure he had to be more specific than that with the Treasury. How much is it likely to cost, and did the Chancellor of the Exchequer include that sum in the PSBR estimates that he gave in the Budget last week?

Mr. Heseltine: There is a complication about the questions that my right hon. Friend asks. I cannot know what level of contracts will follow from the opportunites that I have created, so I have given an indication. The Select Committee mentioned rates of subsidy that would, in its judgment, take the price of British coal from the present production costs to world market prices. The language that I chose, to indicate as much support as I could, was that I would embrace the range of figures that the Select Committee had given.

But I am not prepared—the House will understand—to put a sum of money on the table in public, because we are negotiating with private sector companies, which have their own self-interest for which to negotiate, and the moment they see our price, they will seek to increase it or to give less for it than we would wish to achieve.

While I have discussed this matter fully with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be naive to put one's negotiating cards face up on the table.

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): Why does the right hon. Gentleman not accept what every financial fuel consultant and accountant in the energy industry accepts, that the aging Magnox power stations are the most expensive fuel on base load for the electricity grid? [Interruption.] Hon. Members can say what they want. It is a fact. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman understand that even half the £1,270 million subsidy to the nuclear industry, which is roughly the amount that should have been given in an answer to the hon. Gentleman from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or about £500 million, would save seven collieries, not only in the short term but guaranteeing their long-term security for nearly 15 years?

Mr. Heseltine: On reflection, the hon. Member may feel that he has not totally reflected the situation as it is. British Coal today is coming to the end of a contract which was worth something like £1 billion a year to it in the prices that it was receiving, over and above the market price of coal. In addition, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said during questions, about £18 billion has been put into the industry since 1979, so there is no question but that the coal industry has received, and is receiving, substantial subsidies.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that all the members of the Select Committee agreed that there were severe limits on how far one could extend the coal-generated electricity market? There are no easy answers such as the acceleration of the closure of Magnoxes. The 16 million extra tonnes we thought might be possible could not be written in stone, simply because it was predicated on a total closure of the French link. Will he therefore confirm that, in offering his subsidy to British Coal, he is seeking to increase the market in that range of 12 million to 15 million tonnes a year, and will he confirm that to bring the price of British coal down to import price levels, it is vital that the productivity of British pits is enhanced as quickly as possible? That will need assistance from the House, enabling British Coal to improve management practices and working practices in the pits and enabling the private sector to do a better job than it otherwise would do.

Mr. Heseltine: As a member of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend knows a good deal about the subject. He is right to point to the essential need for British Coal to achieve its productivity levels, not just in the pits but in the management of individual pits and in headquarters staff. These gains must be achieved if there is to be a competitive future for British Coal. I am assured by the management of British Coal that it intends to move forward with dispatch in this direction.

My hon. Friend then asked whether I would give a broad indication of market. I would have to say, having looked at the Select Committee report, that even if one takes out the calculations included for EdF, the assumptions of the Select Committee are still at the top end of the range. They are significantly above, for example, what my own consultants, Caminus, indicated and Caminus are above what British Coal indicates as the likely market, so there is a judgment to be made. The only way to determine the market, however, is for customers to sign contracts, and the customers in this case are bound to be, significantly, the electricity supply industry. It has its own views of what the market will be. It is only on that view or any other market that we can find that contracts will be forthcoming.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Is the President of the Board of Trade aware that 800 miners and their families at Parkside colliery in my constituency will have listened to his statement today with anger and dismay? In a 20-minute presentation to the House, he said not one word about Parkside and the other nine collieries which, it would appear from his statement, are doomed. Will he confirm that British Coal is determined to close Parkside colliery, a colliery that has been profitable in each of the past six years, and throw 800 miners on to the scrap heap in an area where there is already more than 15 per cent. unemployment, at considerable cost to the taxpayer? Is it not a fact that the short-term fix that he has offered to the House today will do nothing for the British mining industry and, in fact, seeks to save his own job?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member will be aware that 30 per cent. of the miners from Parkside have already accepted since last October the redundancy terms that we have made available to them. [Interruption.] He will also be aware that the reason why I did not mention the 10 collieries in my statement is that they are subject to the procedures of consultation and it would be wholly inappropriate for me to refer to them.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): In view of the immense time and trouble that my right hon. Friend has taken to produce this report, for which I thank him, and in view of the detail that it contains, would not it make sense if we debated it slightly later next week, when people have had a chance to digest it and make representations to hon. Members? If we were to debate it on Wednesday or Thursday, it would still be before Easter.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises a matter that is essentially for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I must allow him to judge the order of priority of Government business.
